Hardesty's EARLY WEST VIRGINIA

EDITOR'S NOTE

Every Hardesty's was prefaced with an "Early West Virginia" chapter, an accounting of the struggle of the settlers against the Indians. That account was the same in each book. This series of Hardesty's reprints will carry that account but once, and that in this volume as follows.

When Virginia first became known to the whites, it was occupied by many different tribes of Indians, attached to different nations. That portion lying northwest of the Blue Ridge, and extending to the Great Lakes, was possessed by the Mascarenoes, who were a powerful confederacy, rarely in friendship with the tribes east of those mountains. Little of their history is known, some suppose them to have been the ancestors of the Six Nations, but they more probably became incorporated with them.

This tribe gradually retired, as settlements extended westward from the sea, and when the white men reached the Blue Ridge the country between it and the Alleghenies was entirely the beautiful Valley, of which the Ohio was then only used as a highway for the great parties of Indians, in their wars with other tribes. The Indians of the Ohio and the northern and western expeditions and found to extend the valley. There were villages interspersed the most of whom inhabitants crossed to the northwest between the Alleghenies and the Ohio river, within the present limits of side of the river, as the white settlements advanced.

North of the present boundary of Virginia, and particularly near the junction of the Allegheny and Monongahela rivers, the Indians were more numerous, and their villages larger. The principal of these tribes were the Delawares, Mingoes and Shawnees, the greater part of whom moved westward when the French were forced to abandon their position at the forks of the Ohio river, in 1763. When improvements were commenced by the whites, therefore, in western Virginia, the country was almost entirely uninhabited, excepting by the wild beasts of the forest, and frequent straggling bands of Indians hunters, who wreaked their vengeance upon the whites whenever opportunity offered. In the country northwest of the Ohio, however, there were many warlike tribes who were exceedingly hostile to the colonists, and in the vicinity of the southwestern portion of the State were the Cherokee (who occupied the western part of North Carolina), the Chickasaws and the Catawbas.

FIRST WHITE SETTLERS ON THE MONONGAHELA, ITS BRANCHES, AND IN THE NORTHWEST.

Probably the first white men who built cabins in Virginia west of the Allegheny mountains were David Tygart and Mr. Fies, who came in 1754, the latter settling at the mouth of the creek which now bears his name (where the town of Beverly stands), and the former, a few miles farther up the river (since called Tygarts Valley river), in what is known as Tygarts valley. The only Indians in this vicinity at that time were hunting and war parties from the north and west, whose hostility (and the difficulty in obtaining breadstuff for their families) soon determined these men to abandon their settlements. Before they could carry out their determination, however, the family of Fies became victims to savage cruelty. A strolling band massacred them all excepting a boy, who, making his escape, hastened to the Tygarts and warned them in time, so that they saved themselves by flight.

Soon after this, a settlement was made on Cheat river, a few miles east of where Morgantown now stands, by a party of Dunkards, comprising Dr. Thomas Eckert and his two brothers. They first encamped at the mouth of Dunkards creek, which owes its name to this circumstance, and finally located on Dunkards bottom, on Cheat river. Although a bloody Indian war was then waging, they remained unmolested for several years, when the doctor went to visit a trading post upon the Shenandoah river and obtain supplies. Upon his return, he found the ashes of his cabin and the mutilated bodies of his brothers.

In the fall of 1758, Thomas Decker and others commenced a settlement on the Monongahela, at the mouth of the creek which has since borne his name, but they were driven out in the spring by a war party of Delaware and Mingoes, and many of them murdered. Owing to the continued hostilities, no further effort was made to establish a settlement upon the Monongahela or its branches, until after the treaty of peace, in 1763.

This treaty greatly contributed to advance the prosperity of the Virginia frontiers. While it lasted, the necessity of congregating in forts and block-houses no longer existing, each family enjoyed the comforts of its own fireside, undisturbed by fearful apprehensions of danger from the prowling savage, and free from the confusion and bustle consequent on being crowded together. No longer forced to cultivate their little fields in common, by the united exertions of a whole neighborhood, with tomahawks suspended from their belts and rifles attached to their plow beams, their original spirit of enterprise was revived; and while the certainty of reaping an unmolested safety the harvest for which they had toiled, gave industry an impetus which increased prosperity, it also induced others to come among them, and an increase in population and an extension of settlements was the consequence.

It was during this period that several establishments were made on the Monongahela and its branches. These were nearly contemporaneous, but the first in order was that made on the Buckhannon, a fork of Tygarts Valley river. It was during the year 1764 that John Simpson, a trapper, had his camp at the head of the Youghogany river, and in his employ were John and Samuel Pringle - two soldiers, who had deserted from Fort Pitt. Their glades having begun to be a common hunting ground, Simpson and his party determined upon moving farther west, where they might be free from the incursions of other hunters. After having crossed Cheat river at the Horse Shoe, and while journeying through the wilderness, a quarrel arose between Simpson and one of the Pringles, and they separated, the Pringles keeping up the Valley river until they reached the Buckhannon, which they ascended several miles, and at the mouth of Turkey run took up their abode in the cavity of a large sycamore tree. Here they remained together, subsisting upon game, until 1767, when John left his brother for the purpose of going to a trading post on the Shenandoah to secure ammunition and other supplies. Samuel suffered considerably during his brother's absence, who, however, returned in the course of several weeks, bringing the news of the treaty of peace with the French and Indians. Now, no longer fearing arrest for desertion, and becoming tired of their seclusion, they determined to leave it, not, however, without feelings of regret, and they expected to return as soon as possible, if they could induce others to accompany them to that desirable section.

In the fall of the ensuing year, therefore (1788), Samuel Fringe returned, accompanied by several others, who, being pleased with the appearance of the country, removed there the following spring, locating permanently upon lands selected by them, which they proceeded to cultivate. John Jackson (who was accompanied by his sons, George and Edward) settled at the mouth of Turkey run, John Hacker, farther up on the Buckhannon river, where "Busher's fort" was soon afterward established. Alexander and Thomas Smith, near to the Jacksons, on what was afterward known as the "Pocumash Plantation." It was at the house of George Jackson that the first county court of Harrison was held, in 1784. William Hacker, Thomas and Jesse Hughes, John and William Radcliff and John Brown employed their time exclusively in hunting, neither of them making improvements or land for their own benefit, they proved to be a valuable adjunct to the colonists, however, in supplying the inhabitants with meat, and afterward coming to defend them against the savages. In fact, the skill in woodcraft which they attained afterward constituted their services available. There lived in one of their companies, discovering the West that gave it its name.

John Thompson, after putting with the Fringe brothers, moved over the following year, and putting on to the town of Winchester, Ohio, gave it the name of Winchester. There he was accompanied by his son, John, who was to remain in the town of Winchester, Ohio, and his son, John, who was to remain in the town of Winchester, Ohio.

which time he saw nothing of his former companions, or any human face. At the end of a year, he proceeded to a settlement on the South Branch, where he disposed of a large stock of furs and skins, and returned again to his camp at the mouth of the Elk, remaining until a number of cabins had been erected near the creek, on what is now Main street, in the city of Clarkburg.

After the first arrival, other emigrants soon came, under the guidance of Samuel Fringe, from the South Fork settlements, among whom were John Cuninght, who settled on Buckhannon; Henry Rule, who improved a tract just above the mouth of Funks run, and John and William Radcliff, who both settled on Hacker's creek, - the latter on the place afterward owned by William Powers. John Hacker settled on the creek which took his name.

In 1768, Jacob Vanmeter, John Swan, Thomas Hughes and others, settled on the west side of the Monongahela, near the mouth of Muddy creek. The same year, the place which had been occupied for a time by Thomas Dicker and his unfortunate associates (where Morgantown is now situated) was settled by a party of emigrants, one of whom was David Morgan, afterward so celebrated for personal prowess and daring in his encounters with the Indians.

In 1769, Col. Ebenezer Zane, his brothers Silas and Jonathan, with some others from the South branch, visited the Ohio river for the purpose of commencing improvements, and to select positions for their future residence. Col. Zane chose for his residence above the mouth of Whiting creek, near the Ohio, and opposite a beautiful island, this spot is now in the midst of the flourishing city of Wheeling. Silas Zane commenced improving on Whiting creek, and Jonathan (with several others who accompanied the adventurers) remained with Col. Zane. After making preparations for the occupation of their families, they proceeded to the South branch after their returning in 1773 accompanied by Col. David Shepherd, John Wetzel (father of Lewis and John Wetzel), although some whose names are identified with the early history of that country. Soon after this other settlements were made, at points both above and below Wheeling, on Buffalo, Short and Grave creeks, and the Ohio; among the first to settle above Wheeling were George Lefler, John Doddridge, Benjamin Biggs, Daniel Greenhouse, Joshua Baker and Andrew Swearingen.

About 1770, Capt. James Booth and John Thomas located upon the creek which received the former's name, near the present town of Boothville, Marion county. The former settled at the place known as the "Jesse Martin farm," and the latter on the "old William Martin place." Sixty years later, this latter was called the most valuable landed estate in northwestern Virginia, off the Ohio river.

About this time, also, David Morgan (the noted Indian fighter) established himself upon the Monongahela, near the mouth of Prickett's creek, five miles below Fairmont. Among others settling here at this time, were families by the name of Prickett, Lee, Hall, Cochran, Hayes, Cunningham, Hartley, Barnes, Raymond, Fleming and Springer whose descendants now comprise a large proportion of the population of the surrounding country. Many of them came from the colonies of Virginia, Maryland and Delaware, crossing the mountains by the route known as "Bradlock's trail." In the burying ground at Barnackville is the grave of Adam Lee - the first white child born in Virginia west of the Alleghenies. He was born at Lees Ferry, on Cheat river, in 1767 (a short time previous to the removal of the family to the Monongahela), and he died in 1831.

In 1772, settlements were made on Simpson's creek, West Fork river and Elk creek. John Simpson at this time held a "tomahawk title" on the first-mentioned stream, which was purchased by John Powers, who immediately settled upon it, and James Anderson and Jonas Webb located further up the creek. On the Elk and in the vicinity of Clarksburg, settlements were made by Thomas Nutter, near what was afterward the Large Mills, Samuel Cottinai, on the east side of the creek, nearly opposite Clarksburg; Sotha Hickman, on the west side of the same creek, above Cottinai; Samuel Beard, at the mouth of Nanny's run; Andrew Cottinai, above Beard, on the farm for a long time owned by John W. Patton; Daniel Davison, where Clarksburg is now situated; Obadiah Davison and John Nutter, on the West fork, the former near the old salt works, and the latter at the place for many years owned by Adam Hickman, Jr.

At this time a considerable accession was also made to the settlements on Buckhannon and Hackers creek. So great was the increase in population in the latter neighborhood, that the crops of the preceding season did not afford more than one-third of the breadstuffs that would ordinarily be consumed in the same time by an equal number. Such was the state of suffering caused by this scarcity of food that the year 1773 has been known here as "the starving year," and it was at this time that William Lowmeyer (afterward the first sheriff of Harrison county) rendered such invaluable service, and unselfishly exerted himself to relieve the wants of the people of the community.

In 1772, the fine country lying on the east fork of the Monongahela river, between the Allegheny mountains, at the southeast, and the Laurel hill (or Rock mountain) at the northwest, which had received the name of Tygart's valley, attracted the attention of a number of emigrants, and during that year the greater part of the valley was located. Among those who occupied nearly all the level land lying between those mountains - a plain of about thirty miles in length and varying from three-fourths to two miles in width, of rich soil - are found the names of Hadden, Connelly, Whitman, Warwick, Nelson, Stainaker, Ruffe and Westfall. Cheat river (on which no attempt at settlement had been made but by the unfortunate Eckartys) then began to attract attention. The Horse Shoe bottom was located by Captain James Parsons, of the South branch; also, in the neighborhood, settled Robert Cunningham, Henry Fink, John Goff, and John Munnis, Robert Butler, William Morgan and others settled on the Darkard bottom.

These were the principal settlements begun in Northwestern Virginia prior to the year 1774. Few and scattered as they were, when it became known that they were established, hundreds flocked to them from every part of the country, and no sooner had they come together than amultitude of situation and a common danger created a bond of union and friendship.

THE GREAT KANAWHA RIVER AND ITS TRIBUTARIES

In the year 1753, when all this region was an unbroken wilderness, a party of Shawnees came from their villages on the Scioto river (now in Ohio) and made a raid upon the frontier settlements of Virginia, in what is now Montgomery county. Taking the whites by surprise, they destroyed their settlement, murdered the greater portion of them, and retreated with a number of captives, down New river, Kanawha and Ohio, to their homes. One of these captives was Mrs. Mary Ingles, who afterward made her escape and returned to her friends, to whom she related that the party of savages stopped several days at a salt spring on the Kanawha river, during which time they were engaged in manufacturing salt by boiling the water. This was the first account of salt making west of the Alleghenies.

The earliest white settlement in the Kanawha valley was made by Walter Kelley and family, at the mouth of the creek which bears his name, in 1774, several months before the battle of Point Pleasant. These people were all killed by the Indians; but after the battle of the Point, when there was greater security for life, the valley was rapidly settled, mostly by Virginians, and largely by the hardy soldiers who had followed General Lewis to Point Pleasant. Among the earliest land locations was one of 502 acres, made in 1765 by John Dickinson, (from the Valley of Virginia,) to include the mouth of Campbell's creek, the bottom above, and the salt spring. The place was sold by him to Joseph Ruffner, in 1794, who removed to the Kanawha in 1799, and purchased 900 acres of river bottom from George and William Chedoke, which extended from the mouth of the Elk river up the Kanawha, and upon forty acres of which the village of Charleston had been laid out and started, the previous year.

A few hundred yards above the mouth of Campbell's creek, just in front of Thoroughfare gap, Daniel Boone made a log cabin settlement, and resided on the opposite side of the river, on the Splint Coal bottom. Here he lived for a number of years, engaged in hunting, trapping and fighting the Indians, and in 1791, served as one of the delegates from Kanawha county to the Legislature at Richmond.

The first white man who reached the mouth of the Kanawha, of which history makes mention, was Christopher Gist, the agent and surveyor of the Ohio Land Company. In the year 1749, he set out on a tour of exploration north of the Ohio, where the lands of his employer were located, and in 1750, when on his return, he reached the mouth of the Great Kanawha, and made a thorough exploration of the country north of that river. His journal may be seen in the library of the Massachusetts Historical Society. Mrs. Hannah Denon, in the year 1763, returning from a three years' captivity among the Shawnee Indians beyond the Ohio, reaching the Ohio river in June of that year, crossed it on a drift log at the mouth of the Kanawha, and twenty days afterward reached the settlements on the James. Captain William Astucke, (one of the most distinguished characters in pioneer history) visited the mouth of the Kanawha in 1764, and ten years later was chosen to guide the army of General Lewis to that place. This Kanawha valley became the great thoroughfare by which the Indians, when on their expeditions of bloodshed and murder, reached the eastern settlements, and many were the prisoners carried along this route, when on their way to spend a hopeless captivity in the western wilderness.

The first trail through the wilds from Lewisburg to this valley was that made by the army of General Lewis when on its march to Point Pleasant, in 1774, this was known as "Lewis Track," and was nothing better than a bridle-path, the first wagon-road was completed in 1786. A fort was erected at the mouth of the Kanawha in 1774, and soon afterward Clendenin's fort, where Charleston now stands. Many families resided in these forts during the continuance of the Indian war, who, escaping from their confinement after the declaration of peace, in 1795, began the permanent settlement of the valley. Among these were the families of Ruffner, Arbuckle, Morris, Greenlee, Trotter, Cantrell, Clendenin, Van Bibber and many others.

IN THE GREENBRIER COUNTRY

The first permanent settlement west of the Blue Ridge was made by Jost Hite, who, in 1732, came with fifteen other families, and settled in what is now Frederick county, Virginia; he was soon followed by many others. About the year 1749, there was a man in Frederick county subject to lunacy, and when at times laboring under its influence, he would ramble long distances into the wilderness. In one of these wanderings he came upon the waters of Greenbrier river, and, surprised to find them flowing in a westerly direction, he made the fact known on his return to Winchester, and that the country abounded in game. In consequence of this information, two men (recently from New England), named Suel (Sewell) and Martin (Marlin), visited the locality, and took up their residence on Greenbrier river. The former moved 40 miles west of their first improvement, and fell a prey to the Indians, and the latter soon returned to the settlements. John Lewis and his son Andrew came to the same section in 1731, and thoroughly explored it, and when permission was granted to the Greenbrier company (of which John Lewis was a member) to locate 100,000 acres on the waters of the river, they became the agents to make the surveys and locations. The war between France and England, in 1754, checked these proceedings, and in 1761, they were prevented from entering them by royal edict, which commanded all those who had made settlements on the western waters, to remove from them, in order that peace might be maintained with the Indians, who claimed the right to the domain. Previous to the issuing of this proclamation, some families had moved to Greenbrier and made two settlements - one on Muddy creek, and the other in the Big levels; these, disregarding the royal command, remained until they were destroyed by the Indians, in 1763, and from this time until 1769, Greenbrier was uninhabited; at the latter date, Captain John Stuart and a few other young men began to settle and improve the country.

In 1756, settlements were also made on New river and on Holston, and among the daring adventurers who effected them were Evan Shelby, William Campbell, William Prevon, Thomas Walden and Daniel Boone, all of whom became distinguished in the history of the country. The lands taken up by them were held as "coon rights," each acquiring a title to an hundred acres of land for every acre planted in corn.

THE FIRST ENGLISH TRADERS PRIOR 1795

As early as the year 1740, traders from the colonies of Pennsylvania and eastern Virginia went among the Indians on the Ohio and its tributary streams to deal for skins and pelts. In the second volume of Sparks's Writings of Washington is recorded the first attempt toward a permanent settlement on the Ohio river. "In the year 1748, Thomas Lee, one of his majesty's counsel in Virginia, formed a design of effecting a settlement on the wild lands west of the Allegheny mountains through the association of a number of gentlemen. Before this date there were no English residents in these regions. A few traders wandered from tribe to tribe and dwell among the Indians, but they neither cultivated or occupied the land. Mr. Lee associated with himself Mr. Hanbury, a merchant from London, and twelve persons in Virginia and Maryland, composing the Ohio Land Company. A half million of acres of land was granted them, to be taken principally on the south side of the Ohio river, between the Monongahela and Kanawha rivers."

Following the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, in 1749, the French began to take formal possession of these discoveries on the Ohio river and its tributaries. February 10, 1763, peace was established between Great Britain, France and Spain, at which time France surrendered to the English the Canadas and all her possessions east of the Mississippi river, as far south as the thirty-first degree of latitude, while Spain gave up Florida. In 1764, France ceded Louisiana to Spain, thus abandoning the last of her territory in North America. The Indians being now deserted by their old allies, the French (who, for a long series of years, had been their friends, supplying them with clothing and implements of war), it was thought that they would remain at peace with the English settlements. Having faith in their fair promises to this effect, traders, provided with valuable assortments of merchandise to be exchanged for their peltries, circulated with more freedom among them along the rivers. But in the summer of 1763, a formidable alliance was formed, composed of all the western tribes from the Muskingum to the Michellimackinac, for the purpose of exterminating the whites. They were doubtless partly instigated to this by their old allies, the French, who smarting under their late defeat, looked with a jealous eye upon the advance of the English settler. Preceding their attacks on the forts, they commenced murdering and plundering the English traders. It is estimated, by early writers, that two hundred of these traders, and their servants, lost their lives. A simultaneous attack was made upon all the western forts, and the terrible events which followed, from this time until the spring of 1765, form one of the most thrilling chapters in our country's history.

GENERAL SITUATION 1765-1795

After a treaty of peace with the Indians, by Colonel Bouquet, in 1765, the district of West Augusta began to be settled more rapidly by people from east of the mountains. Between the years 1769-74, the settlements made extended in a circular belt, around a large wilderness of forest, encompassing an Wabasing and Grave creek on the Ohio river, passing over the dividing mountains to the Monongahela river, thence to Clarksburg, on the West Fork river, thence over to Tygart valley and Buckhannon rivers in the east, thence southward to Greenbrier and New rivers, thence westward, down New and Big Kanawha rivers to the Ohio river, at Point Pleasant. This semi-circle embraces about 170 miles on the Ohio river, extending back southeastward from 50 to 125 miles. The vast territory of forest lands in the central part of this tract was left unsettled at that time, owing to the fear of attack from passing bands of Indians, and from this time to the beginning of the present century, it was slow to receive emigrants. From 1785 to 1795, all the tribes of the Northwestern territory (excepting the Moravian Indians) were engaged in a united warfare upon the white settlements.

EVENTS IN THE EARLY HISTORY OF WESTERN VIRGINIA.

A general description of the war between the Indians and the early pioneers is given in the accompanying history of the State. It would be impossible and undesirable to give a full and complete account of the numerous atrocities that were committed during its continuance, it were better, perhaps, to forget some of the heart-ackening details, rather than have the memory of them perpetuated, as it could serve no good purpose. Enough, however, of the most important and interesting, will be chronicled, gathered from the recollections and notes of old pioneers, as will serve to illustrate the spirit of the times, and the trials and troubles of the early settlers.

THE INDIANS PROVOKED TO OPEN HOSTILITY

There were no outbreaks among the Indians of Northwestern Virginia for a period of nearly ten years after the close of the French and Indian war (1763 to 1774), and this state of affairs would doubtless have longer continued, had it not been for the barbarous action on the part of a few whites. Among these atrocities was the unprovoked murder of three Indians by John Ryan, on the Ohio, Monongahela and Cheat rivers, at different periods during this time. Capt. Peter, a chief of some distinction, was the first of Ryan's victims, and the others were also noted warriors, who were on friendly terms with the whites. About the same time, other friendly Indians were killed in this vicinity while visiting the white settlers.

Among the victims to the treachery of this unscrupulous class of white settlers was Bald Eagle, an Indian well known as a warm friend, who was frequently in the habit of associating with them. While on one of his visits to the white settlements, he was waylaid by Jacob Scott, William Hacker and Elijah Runner, and murdered in cold blood. Seizing the body in the stern of a canoe, they set it afloat in the Monongahela river, after thrusting in the mouth of the dead warrior a piece of "journey cake." Several persons noticed the canoe, with its ghastly burden, descending the river, but supposed that Bald Eagle was merely returning from a visit to his white friends at the up-river settlements. The canoe finally floated near the shore, below the mouth of Georges creek, where it was observed by a Mrs. Provance, who, recognizing the unfortunate old man, had him brought to the shore and decently buried.

In 1772, there was an Indian town on the Little Kanawha called Saultown inhabited by five families, who were in habits of friendship and social intercourse with the whites on Buckhannon, and on Hacker creek, frequently visiting and hunting with them. There was interest residing on Canby river the family of a German named Stroud in the summer of that year. He Stroud being from home, his family were all murdered, his house plundered and his cattle driven off. The first made by the murderers in looking to the destruction of Saultown, had in view the supposition that the Indians of the village had been the authors of the outrage, and caused several to resolve to revenge it upon them.

A party of five men, two of whom were William White and William Hacker, who had been concerned in previous murders, expressed a determination to proceed immediately to Saultown. The circumstance of the settlement could not operate to effect a change in their purpose. They went, and on their return, circumstances justified the belief that the pre-apprehension of those who knew the temper and feelings of White and Hacker, had been well founded, and that there had been some fighting between them and the Indians. And notwithstanding they denied having seen an Indian in their absence, yet it was the prevailing opinion that they had destroyed all the men, women and children at Saultown, and thrown their bodies into the river. Indeed, one of the party is said to have, inadvertently, used expressions confirmatory of this opinion, and to have then justified the deed by saying that the clothes and other things known to have belonged to Stroud's family were found in the possession of the Indians. The village was soon after visited, and found to be entirely desolated, and nothing being ever afterward heard of its former inhabitants, there can remain no doubt that the murder of Stroud's family was requited on them.

Now, then, was a fit time for the Indians to commence a system of retaliation and war; if they were disposed to engage in hostilities for offenses of this kind alone. Yet so much event was the consequence of the killing of the Saultown Indians, or of the other murders which preceded that outrage. When the family of the Indian chief, Logan, was killed opposite Yellow creek, he said "The Indians are not angry on account of these murders, but only myself." The renewal of hostilities by the Indians in 1774 was mainly caused by the emissaries of Great Britain, whom allies they became, and who urged and instigated an assault upon the colonists, in order to distract attention from the outrages being perpetrated upon them by England, and also to cripple them and prevent an armed resistance to the King's authority.

which was then threatened. The Indian battle at Point Pleasant, which occurred at this time, an account of which is given in the history of the State, has, therefore, been justly termed the first battle of the Revolutionary war.

CONSTRUCTION OF FORTS AND PREPARATIONS FOR DEFENSE

As soon as it became manifest that there was to be a general war with the Indians, many of the whites in northwestern Virginia made their way to Fort Pitt (now Pittsburgh), at the confluence of the Monongahela and Allegheny rivers, and other smaller forts were rapidly constructed throughout the country. Pickett's fort was erected at the mouth of Pickett's creek, on the Monongahela, about five miles below Fairmont, which afforded protection to all the settlers on the upper Monongahela, in the vicinity of where now stand the towns of Fairmont, Palatine, Riverview and Newport. In Tygart's valley were erected Westfalls and Casinos forts. Near Clarksburg, Nutters fort afforded protection to the inhabitants of the West Fork, from its source to its confluence with the valley river. Jacksons fort, erected on Ten Mile creek, became a rendezvous for the settlers in that neighborhood. These were the most important stations in this part of the state, but there were numerous other strongholds constructed, in different localities, in which a few families in the immediate neighborhood would take refuge when an alarm was given. These were dark days of constant terrors to the people. When at work in the fields, the trusty rifle was a necessary companion, and although the utmost vigilance was exercised, there was no safeguard against the sudden approach of the wily foe, who came upon them when least expected, massacring defenceless families, burning their cabins and hastening on to new fields for capture and plunder. The exigencies of the times developed many a hero, and numerous thrilling scenes of daring adventure and sorrowful and cruel bloodshed occurred.

CHIEF LOGAN'S RAID ON SIMPSONS CREEK

The region of the upper Monongahela was not the scene of active war, but struggling parties of Indians would frequently find their way to that section for the purpose of committing depredations. Probably the first of these incursions into the vicinity was made by a party of eight Indians, led by the celebrated Cayuga chief, Logan, always hitherto (until the murder of his family and other atrocities, impelled him to exchange the pipe of peace for the tomahawk), the honest "friend of the white man." They traversed the country from the Ohio river, to the West Fork, and on the 12th day of July, 1774, came suddenly upon William Robinson, Thomas Hellen and Coleman Brown, who were pulling flax in a field opposite the mouth of Simpsons creek. Taking the whites by surprise, they fired upon them, when Brown was instantly killed, and Hellen and Robinson sought safety in flight. Hellen, being an old man, was soon made captive, but Robinson, being young and active, would have made his escape but for an accident. Noticing that he was outstripping his pursuers, he looked over his shoulder to see whether the Indians were following, and ran with such force against a tree, striking his head, that he fell to the ground, stunned and incapable. Taking with them a horse which had belonged to Brown, the savages set off with their prisoners.

As they approached their village, Logan gave the scalp halloo (as was usual after a successful scout), and several warriors came out to meet them, to conduct the prisoners into camp. Then followed the ceremony of running the gauntlet. Robinson, having been previously instructed by Logan (who had manifested a kindly feeling toward him), made his way with little interruption to the council-house. Poor Hellen, however, being infirm, and ignorant that the council-house was a place of refuge, was badly beaten, and finally knocked down just before reaching the haven of safety. Here he would have been beaten to death, had not Robinson, at great risk to himself, stretched forth and drawn him in. After recovering from the effects of the beating. Helen was adopted into an Indian family. Robinson was tied to the stake to be burned, and Logan interceded with his matchless eloquence, for his preservation. While some of the savages were moved by it, and inclined to mercy, the greater portion insisted on proceeding with the cruel tragedy, until the chief, enraged at their pertinacity, and heedless of the consequence, drew his tomahawk, and severing the cords which bound the prisoner, led him hastily to the cabin of an old squaw, by whom he was immediately adopted. Logan continued a friend to Robinson, who remained with his adopted mother until he was redeemed under the treaty made at the close of the Denmark campaign.

INDIAN MURDERS-ATTACK ON FORT HARBERT

In September, 1774, Josiah Prickett and Mrs. Susan Ox left Prickett's fort, near Newport, for the purpose of driving up their cows. Attracted by the tinkling of the cow-bells, a party of Indians waylaid them, and succeeded in killing and scalping the former and taking the latter prisoner.

For two years after this, although the Indians continued their depredations throughout the country (utterly ignoring the treaty of peace made at Point Pleasant), no serious outrages happened in that immediate vicinity. The next important event of the kind occurred in June, 1777, on Roosting creek, a branch of West Fork, at the house of Charles Gribby. During the absence of Mr. Gribby, a party of Indians entered his house, and, after plundering it, departed, taking with them Mrs. Gribby and her two children as prisoners. The husband and father soon after returned, and, comprehending instantly what had been done, he hastily gathered a few of his neighbors together and started in pursuit. After following the trail for about six miles, they came upon a ghastly scene lying on the ground were the bodies of Mrs. Gribby and her youngest child, both killed and mangled by their inhuman captors.

Leaving two of their number to take care of the remains, the men pushed forward, eager to overtake the savages and avenge the bloody deed, but they were finally obliged to give up in despair and return home.

Soon after this, two Indians scented themselves near Coons fort, on West Fork, waiting an opportunity to do some mischief, when a daughter of Mr. Coon came out of the fort into a field which bordered the roadside. Enuch Jones and Thomas Cunningham, coming down the road, held a short conversation with her, and passed on. In the meantime, the Indians were waiting for her to come near enough to enable them to capture her without alarming the people at the fort; but, turning suddenly, she observed them, and started to run home. Instantly one of the savages shot at her, while the other overtook and tomahawked her before the eyes of the horrified men, who were too far distant to render her aid. The settlers immediately started in pursuit, but the savages managed to evade them.

On the 3d of March following (1778), a party of Indians came suddenly upon a number of children playing in a yard, on Tenmile creek, belonging to the house known as Fort Harbert - a place of refuge for the settlers in the neighborhood. The children ran, screaming to the house, and apprised the inmates of the approach of the savages. John Murphy, hastening to the door, was instantly shot, and fell back into the house. The Indian who had fired, not knowing that there were other men in the house, sprang in, and was instantly grappled by Mr. Harbert, who threw him upon the floor, and struck him with his tomahawk. While standing over the prostrate savage, two shots were fired at Harbert from without, one of which passed through his head and killed him. In the meantime, Edward Cunningham was having a scruple struggle with a warrior who had entered immediately after the first one. Drawing up his gun, he attempted to shoot the savage, but it missed fire, and the two men closed in a hand-to-hand encounter. After a few moments' combat, Cunningham wrenching the Indian's tomahawk from his hand and buried it in his back, while Mrs. Cunningham struck the savage a hasty blow with an ax, causing him to release his hold upon Cunningham, and beat a retreat from the house. The third Indian who entered the door wore the unborn front of a buffalo, with the ears and horns still attached, and as he entered, he struck Miss Reece a blow which wounded her severely. Mrs. Reece, seeing the imminent danger of her daughter, seized the head-dress of the savage by its horns, hoping to turn aside the blow, but it came off in her hands and the blow fell upon the girl's head. Mr. Reece then smacked the Indian, but was quickly thrown to the floor, and would have been killed, had not Cunningham rushed to the rescue and tomahawked the assailant. During this time, the balance of the Indians, who had been prevented from entering the door by the women, were engaged in securing the children in the yard, in order to carry them off as prisoners; having secured the greater portion and killed the balance, they retreated. In this attack one white person was killed in the house, and four wounded, three of the eight children in the yard were killed, and the balance taken prisoners, the Indians had one killed and two wounded.

HUGHES AND LOWTHER SHOT, AND DEATH OF ISAAC WASHBURN

In the latter part of the following April (1778), a party of about twenty Indians came to the neighborhoods of Hackers creek and the West Fork. At this time, the inhabitants had taken refuge in West fort, on the creek, and in Richards fort on the river, and, leaving the women and children in there during the day, under the protection of a few men, the others were in the habit of working upon their farms in companies so that they might protect themselves from Indian attack. A company of men being thus engaged, during the first week in May, in a field cultivated owned by Minter Burdett on Hackers creek, some hunting others chasing or plowing, and being somewhat separated, they were unexpectedly fired upon by the Indians; and Thomas Hughes and Jonathan Lowther shot down, the others, being cautiously without arms, fled for safety. Two of the number (during the Indians between them and Wests fort), fled towards Richards, as well for the preservation of their lives as to give the alarm. The Indians had, however, been apprised that the enemy was at hand, Isaac Washburn (who had been to mill the day before, on Hackers creek) when returning to Richards fort, and near to where Clements mills were afterward located, was shot from his horse, tomahawked and scalped. The finding of his body had given the alarm, and they were already on their guard before the arrival of the two men from Hackers creek. The Indians left the neighborhood without doing further mischief, and the whites were not strong enough to pursue them.

DEATH OF MRS. FREEMAN AND PURSUIT OF THE INDIANS

In June of this year, three women went out from Wests fort to gather greens in a field near by, and while thus engaged were fired upon by four Indians, who were lying in wait. Only one shot was fired, the ball passing through Mrs. Hackers's bonnet without hitting her, and the women ran for the fort, giving the alarm. An Indian in pursuit, having in his hand a staff with a spear at the end, thrust it through Mrs. Freeman, and then cleft the upper part of her head with his tomahawk and carried it off to secure the scalp. The screams of the women alarmed the men at the fort, who ran out and fired at the Indians without effect. Although not in time to save Mrs. Freeman, the firing served to warn the men, who were out, of their danger, and they quickly came in.

Jesse Hughes and John Schoolcraft, in making their way to the fort, saw two Indians standing by the fence so intently watching the proceedings that they managed to go around them and enter the fort without being discovered. Hughes, securing his gun, immediately started in pursuit, followed by Charles and Alexander West, Elias Hughes, James Brown and John Smith and hearing one of the Indians howl like a wolf in signal among the savages answered him and the men proceeded in the direction from whence the sound came. Running to the top of a hill they saw two Indians coming toward them, in answer to their signal, and Hughes fired, when one savage fell, the other taking to flight. The fugitive sprang into the thick bushes, and while they ran around to intercept him, he came out by the way he had entered and escaped. The wounded Indian had in the meantime recovered his feet and made off, and although they tracked him some distance by the blood which flowed from his wound, a heavy rain commenced falling which soon obliterated the trail, and they were obliged to give up the chase.

DEATH OF CAPT. BOOTH AND CAPTURE OF CAPT. COCHRAN.

As Capts. James Booth and Nathaniel Cochran were at work in a field on Booths creek, near the present village of Berntown, on June 16, 1778, they were surprised by a party of Indians, who fired upon them, killing Booth, and slightly wounding Cochran. The latter fled, but was soon overtaken, made prisoner, and carried off to the Indian village in Ohio. He was soon afterward taken to Detroit, where he was sold to another tribe, and remained a prisoner for a long period. While at Detroit he attempted to make his escape, and would have succeeded had he not unfortunately taken a path which led him directly to the old Maumee town, where he was recaptured, and, after being detained for a short time, sent back to Detroit. After enduring many hardships, and having been traded backward and forward among the Indians, he was finally ransomed, and found his way home. When taken captive he was a youth of eighteen, but when he returned he was a man of thirty-five years of age. He seemed to have been a favorite among the Indians, and was generally treated very kindly during the seventeen years which he spent among them.

Capt Booth was probably the most prominent man in the section in which he lived, a gentleman of good education and great talent and energy.

and his loss was deeply felt and mournfully regretted.

DEATH OF GRUNDY SAD FATE OF JAMES WASHBURN.

A few days after the killing of Booth, the same party of Indians met Benjamin Shinn, Benjamin Washburn and William Grundy, returning from the head of Booths creek. As they lay in ambush, near Baxters run, they fired upon the whites, when Grundy was killed, and the others made their escape. William was a brother to Hon. Felix Grundy, of Tennessee, whose father was then residing at Simpsons creek, on a farm afterward owned by Col. Benjamin Wilson, sr. The death of this brother was pathetically referred to by Felix Grundy in an eloquent speech delivered by him several years afterward in the halls of Congress.

Continuing on their way, the savages discovered James Owens, a lad sixteen years of age, who was on his way from Powers fort, on Simpsons creek, to Booths creek, and had just dismounted to adjust his saddle-girth; they fired, and the ball passed directly through him, killing both himself and horse.

A family of Washburns, on the West Fork, having several times narrowly escaped from the Indians, commenced making arrangements for their departure. While two of them were engaged in procuring pine-knots from which to make wax for shoe-making, they were discovered and fired at by the Indians. Stephen fell dead, and James was taken prisoner and carried to their town. Upon Nathaniel Cochran's return, he related the story of Washburn's captivity. On the evening of the latter's first arrival at the Indian village, he was made to run the gauntlet, and, although he succeeded in reaching the council house, where Cochran was, he was so terribly beaten, disfigured and mutilated that he could not be recognized by his old acquaintances, and so stunned and stupified that he remained nearly all night in a state of insensibility.

Being somewhat revived in the morning, he approached Cochran, sitting by the fire, who asked him if his name was not James Washburn. The joy of the latter was unbounded, at thus unexpectedly meeting with a friend, and he was at once saturated with a strong feeling of hope. This sensation was, however, soon extinguished in the poor fellow's breast; in a few moments, he was again led forth, and the barbarities of the preceding night were continued. He was too much enfeebled and exhausted to save himself from the sticks and clubs even of the old men and women, who followed with the more active, and the severest blows were inflicted. He was frequently beaten to the ground, when, aggravated by the extremity of anguish, he would rise to his feet and stagger forward. Thus hobbling before his tormentors, with no hope but death, the tendons of his legs were severed by the knife of an old savage, and he sank to the earth, unable to proceed farther. Blows now fairly rained upon him, and while writhing upon the ground, in an agony of torture, his scalp was taken. Struggling to his feet, in the delirium of pain, his head was severed from his body and attached to a pole which was erected in the village.

DAVID MORGAN'S ADVENTURE

Early in the year 1779, a rumor that Indians were lurking in the neighborhood caused the inhabitants about Pickens fort to enter it for protection. Many days passed, however, yet no signs of approaching savages were discovered. Spring approached, and, although it was the season when the Indians generally commenced their depredations, it was necessary for the settlers to attend to their farm duties, which they did, during the day, returning to the fort at night. Among those who thus sought shelter was David Morgan (hereinafter mentioned), a relative of General Daniel Morgan, who at this time was over sixty years of age. As he was suffering from illness, about the first of April, he sent his two children - Stephen, a youth of sixteen years, and Sarah, a girl of fourteen - to feed the cattle on his farm, which was about a mile distant, on the opposite side of the river.

Unknown to their father (who supposed they would return immediately), the children took with them a lunch and resolved to spend the day on the farm, to prepare the ground for watermelons. After feeding the stock, Stephen set to work, his sister helping him in various ways, and occasionally going to the cabin, a short distance west of where they were, to wet some linen which she was bleaching.

After the children had left the fort, Morgan (whose illness increased) went to bed, and, falling asleep, dreamed that he saw Sarah and Stephen, walking about in the yard, scalped. This dream caused him an unaccountable feeling of apprehension, which increased when he learned that quite a long time had elapsed and the children were still absent, and, taking with him his gun he immediately set out for the farm to see what detained them. Ascending a slight eminence which overlooked the field where they were, he rejoiced to see them safe, and merrily talking as they worked. He sat down, unobserved by them, to rest, and, keeping a close watch, he discovered two Indians stealing from the cabin toward them. Fearing that a sudden alarm would cause them to lose their self possession, he called to them, in a cheery tone, and bade them "skip for the fort." Having been trained to obedience, they started instantly, and the Indians, with hideous yells, sprang in pursuit. Morgan, at this juncture, made his presence known to them, and, giving up the chase, they sheltered themselves from his bullets behind intervening trees.

Time enough having elapsed to assure him of the safety of the children, and considering discretion the better part of valor, Morgan commenced a retreat, but found that age and infirmity were telling upon him and he should soon be overtaken. He therefore suddenly wheeled, with the intention of firing, but the savages again sprang behind trees. Morgan secured a like position and watched and waited. One of the Indians stood behind a sapling which was insufficient to cover his body, and he therefore threw himself behind a log at the foot of the tree. This also failed to entirely shelter him, and

Morgan, observing his exposed position, fired, and the ball taking effect, the savage rolled over on his back and stabbed himself twice — being disabled by the shot he desired to clear his enemy out of the honor of dealing him his deathwound. Having thus rid himself of one of his pursuers, Morgan again commenced his flight, the remaining Indian in close pursuit. The race thus continued for about twenty rods, when, looking over his shoulder, Morgan discovered the Indian almost upon him with his gun raised, as the latter pressed the trigger, Morgan stepped quickly aside and the ball went harmlessly by. Morgan then aimed a blow at his adversary with his gun, and the latter in turn hurled his tomahawk at him, cutting off the little finger of his left hand and knocking his weapon from his grasp. They then closed, and Morgan, being a good wrestler, notwithstanding his age, succeeded in throwing the Indian. He was not strong enough to retain his position, however, and the Indian was soon on top of him, and, with a yell of triumph, commenced feeling for his knife. Fortunately for Morgan, the Indian had been attracted by the bright color of an apron which he had found in the cabin, and had bound it about his waist, over the knife, and while he was fumbling for it Morgan got one of the Indian's fingers in his mouth. Finally the Indian succeeded in drawing his knife, grasping it near the blade, and as he did so the old man shut his teeth down upon the redskin's finger, which caused him to relax his hold, and Morgan, quickly drawing the knife through his hand, plunged it into his body. Feeling the Indian sink back lifeless in his arms, he released himself and started for the fort. Stephen had in the meantime seen the over, and Morgan overtook Sam on the bank, in quest of the canoe. Finding it they crossed and entered the fort together.

After relating his adventures, Morgan retired, well-nigh exhausted, and a party of men started out to see if traces of any more could be found. On arriving where the struggle had taken place, the wounded Indian was not to be seen, but they trailed him by the blood which flowed from his side, and presently found him concealed in the branches of a tree. As they approached him, he greeted them appealingly with the salutation "How do, brother," and surrendered himself into their hands. Then occurred one of those scenes which demonstrate how near skin to the brute creation mankind can appear when controlled by passion — an act as cruel, malignant and unmanly as was ever perpetrated by a savage. They tomahawked and scalped the wounded and defenseless Indian, flayed him and his dead companion, tanned their skins, and converted them into shot pouches and belts.

The above incident took place on that part of Morgan's plantation which is a short distance northeast of the residence of the late George P. Morgan. David's cabin stood near where the burying ground of the Morgan family is now situated, and his remains, with those of his family, rest within the enclosure.

About two months after this occurrence (June, 1779), as John Owens, John Juggins and Owen Owens were going to their cornfield, on Booths creek, they were attacked by Indians, who killed and scalped the former two, but the latter escaped. A son of John Owens, who had been sent to the pasture for the horses, heard the report of the gun, and came riding along on one horse, leading the other, eager to learn the cause of the firing. He found out very suddenly, as the first intimation he received of the presence of the Indians was the whistling of the bullets that fortunately passed close by without hitting him, and, urging his horse forward, he escaped.

A WOMAN'S HEROIC ACTION

The alarm which had caused the people in the neighborhood of Ficketts fort to move into it for safety, in the spring of 1779, induced two or three families to collect at the house of Mr. Bonarath, on Dunkards creek. About the first of April, when only Mrs. Bonarath and two men were in the house, the children, who had been at play, came running into the yard, declaring that "some ugly red men were coming." One of the men, going to the door to ascertain the girth, received a glancing shot on the breast which caused him to fall back, and the Indian who had fired sprang at, and being grappled by the other white man, was thrown upon the bed. The savage's antagonist, having no weapon, called to Mrs. Bozarth for a knife, not finding one, she seized an ax, and with one blow, brained the ex, and with one blow, a prostitute Indian. At this time, a second savage entered the door and shot dead the white man who had just been having the encounter on the bed. With a well directed blow, Mrs. Bozarth disabled him; he howled for help, and others of the party who were engaged in securing the children in the yard, came to his relief. The first who thrust his head in had it cleft by the ax in the hands of Mrs. B., and he fell lifeless to the ground. Another catching hold of his wounded companion, drew him out of the house, when Mrs. B., with the aid of the white man who had first been shot (and had somewhat recovered), succeeded in closing and barring the door. The children in the yard were all killed, but the heroic exertions of Mrs. Bozarth and the wounded white man, enabled them to resist the repeated attempts of the Indians to force open the door, until a party from the neighboring settlement came to their relief.

DEATH OF NATHANIEL DAVISSON

In September of this year, Nathaniel Davison and his brother being on a hunting expedition up Tenmile creek, left their camp early in the morning of the day on which they intended to return home, and, seeing an hour at which they would be back, proceeded through the woods in different directions. At the appointed time, Josiah entered the camp, and, after waiting in vain for the arrival of his brother, became uneasy and set out in search of him. Unable to get trace of him, he returned home and got many of his neighbors to join him in a more extended search, which was also unavailing. In the following March, however, his body was found by John Reed, while hunting in the neighborhood, he had been shot and seized by the Indians.

ATTACK UPON SAMUEL CONTRAIL

The last mischief that was done during the fall of this year, in this neighborhood, was perpetrated at the house of Samuel Contrail, near the present town of Chambersburg. During the night considerable fear was excited (both at Contrail's and at Sotha Hickman's, on the opposite side of Elk creek, by the continued barking of the dogs, that the Indians were lurking near, and Contrail securely fastened the doors, giving instructions that no one was to go out of the house in the morning until it was ascertained that no danger threatened. Some time before day (Contrail being asleep), Moses Coleman, who lived with him, got up, shelled some corn, and, giving a few cents to Contrail's nephew (with directions to feed the pigs around the yard), went to a hand-mill, in the out-house, and commenced grinding. The little boy, being squatted down, shelling the corn to the pig, found himself suddenly drawn on his back and an Indian standing over him, ordering him to lie there. The savage then turned toward the house when Coleman was and fired, and as Coleman fell, ran up to seize him. Thinking this his favorable opportunity, the boy sprang to his feet, and, running to the house, was admitted. Scarcely was the door secured, when another Indian came up and endeavored to break it open with his tomahawk; Contrail fired through the door at him, and he fled. Contrail then ascended to the loft, and through a crevice esaped the savages entering through a field, so far distant that it was impossible to reach them with a rifle-ball. He continued to fire and halloo, however, in order to give notice of danger to his neighbors.

DISASTROUS ENCOUNTER WITH THE INDIANS

Early in March, 1780, Thomas Luckey, discovered signs of Indians near the upper extremity of Tygart's valley, and hastened to inform the inmates of Hadden's fort; being so late in the season, however, and the weather cold, none believed or heeded

it. On the next day, as Jacob and William Warwick, and others from Greasbrier, were about leaving the fort for their homes, it was agreed that a company of men should attend them a short distance as a matter of what was deemed by many an act of unnecessary precaution. Proceeding carefully on their way, they were attacked by a party of Indians lying in ambush, when the men on horseback got safely off, but those on foot were less fortunate. The savages having occupied the pass above and below, those unmounted had no chance to escape but in crossing the river and ascending a steep bluff on its opposite side; in attempting this, John McLain, James Ralston and John Nelson were killed, after a brave resistance, and James Crouch was badly wounded, but escaped. Soon after this, the wife of John Gibson was killed, and their children taken prisoners.

SIEGE OF WEST'S FORT—INDIANS REPULSED

About this time West's fort, on Hackers creek, was visited by the savages, and the inmates being too weak in numbers to successfully resist an attack, were reduced to despair, when Jesse Hughes resolved at great risk to go for assistance. Leaving the fort at night, he cautiously found his way past the sentinels, and ran with all speed to Buchannon fort, where he raised a party of volunteers who hastened to the rescue. Arriving before day, the Indians retreated at their approach, and the whole party proceeded in safety to Buchannon fort.

Two days afterward, as Jeremiah Carl, Henry Fiss and Edmund West (who were all old men), and Alexander West, Peter Cutright and Simon Schockcraft, were returning to the fort with some property which they were gathering for a neighbor, they were fired upon by the Indians, who were concealed along the bank of a river. Carl was slightly wounded, but declining to retreat, he called out to his companions, "Stand your ground, we can whip them." At this moment, a powerful warrior rushed at him with upraised tomahawk, and Carl fearlessly raised his gun, but the powder being wet from the blood of his wound, it would not explode; grasping West's gun he discharged it in his assailant and brought him to the ground. The Indians then divided into two parties, and were pursued by the whites, when they had behind trees. Alexander West shot and badly wounded one of the savages, but he was helped off by his companions. Simon Schockcraft received a shot through his arm which would have penetrated his body had it not struck his steel tobacco box in his waistcoat pocket. Cutright espied a savage partly exposed behind a log, and with steady nerve, fired upon and severely wounded him. The balance of the Indians continued behind trees until reinforcements coming to aid the whites, they fled, and as night had by this time approached, they were not pursued. In the morning, a company of fifteen men followed their trail, and, overtaking them, secured a number of horses and a large amount of plunder which they had stolen. In the encounter John Cutright was slightly wounded.

ABANDONMENT OF BUCHANNON FORT

On the 8th or March, as William White and Timothy Dorman and his wife were going to Buchannon fort, and had come within sight of it, they were fired at by the Indians, when the former was killed, and the latter two taken prisoners. The inmates of the fort heard the firing, but could not render assistance in time, as the river lay between. The loss of West was greatly mourned, as he was one of the ablest and most active of the rangers. A consultation was held, and it was resolved to abandon the fort on account of its exposed position.

While some of the inhabitants of the neighborhood were engaged in moving their property to a fort in Tipton valley, and to Hackers fort and Clarkburg, they were attacked by a party of savages, and Michael Greiv and John Painter fell. John Bush had his horse shot from under him, but he extricated himself and succeeded in escaping, a youth named Edward James was taken prisoner.

Soon after these occurrences, a party of about thirty savages, headed by the infamous Timothy Dorman (who had served traitor to the whites after being taken prisoner), came to attack Buckhannon fort; they were too late, however, to accomplish their bloody purpose, as the settlement was deserted, and the inhabitants safe within the walls of other fortresses.

A few days after the evacuation of the fort, some of its former inmates went from Clarksburg to Buckhannon for grain that had been left there. When they came in sight, they found a heap of ashes where the old fort had been, which convinced them of the recent presence of Indians, but they continued to collect grain, and at night went to a house near the site of the fort, where they took up their quarters. In the morning early, a party of savages was seen crossing the river, with Dorman at their head, when the whites, thinking to impress the enemy with an exaggerated idea of their strength, made a hurried advance toward them and they took to the woods. The whites then entered the house and fortified it as best they could, and at night George Jackson undertook the hazardous task of going to Clarksburg for reinforcement, which he successfully accomplished, and the party returned home with their gain.

Discouraged in not being able to accomplish anything here, the savages went on to the valley, where they met John Bush and wife, Jacob Mahan and his son Adam; the latter fell at the first fire, but the balance providentially escaped. The Indians then crossed the Allegheny mountains, and made an attack upon Mr. Gregg, Dorman's former master. The family all escaped but the daughter, who was taken prisoner; refusing to accompany Dorman, the barbaric wretch sunk his tomahawk into her head, and then scalped her.

the site of the present town of Booths-ville. Elizabeth Jiggins (daughter of John Jiggins, whose murder has been previously mentioned) was visiting at the house at this time. When the Indians arrived, the inmates were engaged in family devotions, and Capt. Thomas was in the act of repeating the lines of the hymn, "Go, worship at Emanuel's feet." A gun was fired from without, and he fell, when the Indians forced open the door, and commenced the most dreadful orgy that had as yet been enacted in that neighborhood.

Mrs. Thomas implored mercy for herself and children in vain; she was answered with a blow from the tomahawk in the hands of a brawny warrior, and in a short space of time her body and those of six of her children lay weltering in their blood around that of her husband. The savages then proceeded to scalp their victims, and, after plundering the house, took their departure, accompanied by one little boy as prisoner.

As soon as the new Capt. Thomas fell, Miss Jiggins threw herself under the bed, where she remained hidden during the fearful occurrence. When the savages had gone, she came out from her hiding place and found Mrs. Thomas alive, though unable to move. She asked Miss Jiggins to hand her the body of her murdered infant, and begged her not to leave her, but the young lady, anxious for her own safety, took refuge for the balance of the night between two logs. In the morning she spread the alarm among the neighbors, who hastened to the scene, and found the body of Mrs. Thomas lying in the yard, where she had crawled and died during the night. The Indians had evidently made the place a second visit, for all that remained of the house and bodies was a heap of ashes and charred bones. After this massacre, the settlement on Booths creek was abandoned, and the settlers went to Simpson's creek for greater security.

MASSACRE OF THE THOMAS FAMILY

Early in the month of March, 1861, a party of Indians made a raid upon the settlements along the Monongahia, and on the night of the 15th arrived at the house of Capt. Thomas, on Booths creek, near

DEATH OF A PARTY OF INDIANS DEATH OF CHARLES WASHBURN

In the month of April, 1762, as some men were returning to Chest

river from Clarksburg (where they had been to obtain certificates of settlement rights to their lands, from the commissioners), they encountered a large party of Indians, after crossing the Valley river, and three of the whites were killed; the balance fled back to Clarksburg and gave the alarm. This was quickly communicated to the other settlements, and spies were sent out to watch for the enemy. The savages were discovered by some of these on West fork, at the mouth of Isaac creek, and intelligence was immediately carried to the forts. Col. William Lowther collected a company of men, and going in pursuit, came within view of their encampment, just before night, on a branch of Hughes river, ever since known as Indian creek. Jesse and Elias Hughes (active and intrepid men) were left to watch the movements of the savages, while the balance retired a short distance to refresh themselves, and prepare for an attack in the morning.

Before day, Col. Lowther arranged his men in order of attack, and when a bright light (a preconcerted signal having been given), a general fire was poured in upon the enemy. Five of the savages fell dead, leaving all their plunder and ammunition, and all their guns excepting one. A number of captives were thus released, but one (a son of Alexander Rony) was unfortunately killed by the fire of the whites. Deeming it imprudent to follow, Col. Lowther and party buried young Rony, and securing the horses, plunder, ammunition, etc., of the savages, returned home.

In June, some Indians came into the neighborhood of Clarksburg, and one of them (more venturesome than the rest) entered the town and shot Charles Washburn, who was chopping wood in his lot. Then taking up, he aimed his shell with the ax, took his scalp and escaped. Three of Washburn's brothers had previously been murdered by the savages.

ATTACK UPON THE CLINCHMAN FAMILY

Among the settlers who came into the country from 1780 to 1785, were

David Evans, two families named Wileman, Henry Leeper, Benjamin Veach, the Holberts and others. The first three settled in the vicinity of Yellow Rockford, on the West fork. Veach settled upon a farm a short distance west of Fairmont. Jonathan Nixon (from whom those of the same family name in this section descended) located, about this time, near Boothsville. Many other families came into this neighborhood, immediately following the close of the Revolutionary war, until it became quite well populated, and no serious Indian depredations occurred here until 1785.

During this year, six Indians came upon the farm of Thomas and Edward Cunningham, on Bingenon creek, which empties into the West fork a short distance above Worthington, Marion county. The two brothers lived, with their respective families, in two separate houses which nearly adjoined each other. Thomas was east of the mountains on a trading expedition at this time and his wife and four children were engaged in eating dinner, as were also Edward and his family, in their house. Suddenly, an Indian entered the former house, and closed the door behind him. Edward, from his cabin, observed this proceeding, and, after fastening his own door, stepped to a small window in the wall next to the other house, and stood ready to fire the moment that he caught sight of the Indian. The savage, however, saw the movement, and fired at him, without effect. The moment that he discovered that he had missed his mark, the Indian seized an ax and commenced cutting his way out of the back wall of the house, to avoid exposing himself to a fire from the other building. Another Indian at this time coming into the yard, Edward fired at and wounded him.

In the meantime, Mrs. Cunningham and her children, who were in the house with the Indian, remained perfectly quiet, hoping that he would retire without molesting them. In this she was doomed to disappointment. Hearing (instead of the opening, the savage approached the frightened group, and, snaking his tomahawk into the brains of one of the children, threw the body into the yard and ordered Mrs. Cunningham to follow. She obeyed, holding one infant in her arms, the other two screaming and clinging to her.

After setting fire to the house, the Indians retired with his prisoners to an enclosure in the adjoining field, where two of his brethren were caring for the one who was wounded. Two others were in the yard watching for the opening of the door of Edward's house, when the fire should drive the family from their shelter. When his wife caught fire, however, from the other burning building, Edward and his men ascended to the left, and, throwing off the loose boards which formed the roof, extinguished the flames, the savages, in the meantime, making an ineffectual attempt to shoot them.

The Indians finally abandoned, for a time, their designs against Edward and his family, and made preparations for departure. They first tomahawked and scalped the remaining son of Mrs. Cunningham, and sank a hatchet into the head of her little daughter, whom they then took by the legs, and beat her brains out against a tree. Mrs. Cunningham and her babe were carried off into captivity. Crossing at Squamam creek, the Indians concealed themselves in a cave until nightfall, when they returned to Edward Cunningham's aid, finding no one there, they plundered and set fire to the house.

Fearing that the Indians would renew the attack, Edward and his family had sought shelter in the woods, where they remained all night, the nearest settlement being eight miles distant. As soon as morning dawned, they proceeded to the nearest house and gave the alarm, when a company was formed to go in pursuit of the Indians. After burying the bodies of the murdered children, a search was instituted, but the wisest men had no covered up their retreat that no traces could be found of them. It was afterward proven that the Indians were in the cave, before mentioned, when the party in pursuit were so close that the prisoner (Mrs. Cunningham) heard their voices, when they afterward thought to search this place, the savages had taken their departure.

The sufferings of Mrs. Cunningham, in her rapid journey about to the Indian towns, were beyond description. Her babe was killed, soon after starting, and to the most intense anguish of mind was added all the bodily sufferings that could possibly be endured. On arriving at their place of destination, it became apparent to her that she was to suffer death by the most cruel tortures, and, Simon Carly arriving in the village, she pleaded to him to earn a ransom for deliverance, that the story heart of this white savage was for once touched to such a degree that he paid her ransom. She was conducted to a station in Kentucky, whence, having been furnished with a horse, she found her way home, after experiencing many hardships. The joy of finally meeting her husband was veiled with bitter grief in the memory of the cruel fate of their children.

OTHER INDIAN ATROCITIES

In the fall of 1786, John Lee and James Snodgrass left home to look for some horses they had lost while hunting buffalo on Fishing creek. They were killed and scalped by a party of Indians, and their remains were found several days afterward.

Soon after this occurrence, a party of Indians in passing Buffalo Creek, came suddenly upon Mrs. Drago and her son in a cornfield, took them prisoners, and then hid in ambush beside the path leading to the house in anticipation of the approach of others. Unwary at the detention of Mrs. Drago and her son, Nicholas Wood and Jacob Straight came out to learn the cause, and were fired upon, the former being killed, and the latter, after a short chase, captured. The savages then started in pursuit of Mrs. Straight and her daughter, but hearing the firing, they had so effectually concealed themselves that the Indians failed to find them. Before taking their departure, Straight was killed and scalped.

Placing Mrs. Drago upon a horse, they started with her and her son for the Indian towns. Soon after starting, the horse upon which she was riding slipped and fell, and Mrs. Drago's limb was broken. This unfortunate accident cost the woman her life, for the Indians immediately tomahawked and scalped her. Her son William (a lad of about seven years of age) reached the Indian town and remained a captive for many years. Soon after the war with the savages had ceased, Drago's brother started from home to see if he could gain tidings of him, and found him, after a diligent search, among the Indians in northwestern Ohio. He had married an Indian girl (who had recently died), by whom he had four children. He would not return with his brother, but, according to his promise, he soon afterward came to Buffalo creek, bringing two of his boys with him. Here he remained, and his children received as good an education as the common schools of that time afforded.

ONE OF LEVI MORGAN'S ADVENTURES

In the year 1787, some Indians again visited the settlement on Buffalo creek near the present town of Farmington, and came upon Levi Morgan, who was a short distance from home, engaged in skinning a wolf which he had just caught in a trap. On looking up from his occupation, he observed three savages coming toward him, one of them being mounted upon a horse which he recognized as belonging to a neighbor. Seizing his gun, he sprang behind a rock, near by, and as he did so, the Indians took refuge behind trees. Looking out from his shelter he found one of the savages exposed, and firing, with a quick aim, killed him. Attempting to reload, he found his powder gone, and took to flight. One of the remaining Indians started in pursuit, and then ceased an exciting chase. Although Morgan was a fleet runner, his pursuer gained upon him, notwithstanding the fugitive divested himself of gun and case. His chances for saving his scalp were becoming desperate, when the natural shrewdness of the backwoodsman came to his rescue. Arriving at the summit of a hill, he stopped short, and, waving his arms in a frantic manner, shouted, "This way - make haste! There is only one of them!" The Indian, naturally supposing that Morgan had met some of his friends on the other side of the hill turned and made a hasty retreat, his speed accelerated by the quick-witted Morgan, who enjoying the situation, gave chase for a short distance, leading his imaginary victims with urgent shouts. He took pains, however, to allow the savage to gain upon him, and when out of sight he returned home.

Morgan afterward attended the treaty of peace at Amherst, and met this Indian, in whose hands he recognized his gun. He took great delight in relating to the savage how he had out-generated him, and proposed a friendly race to decide the ownership of the gun. The proposition was accepted, and the Indian was beaten. Good-humoredly passing over the weapon, he rubbed his limbs exclaiming, "Stiff and old!"

A FATAL ERROR-MURDER OF WILLIAM JOHNSON'S CHILDREN

In September, 1787, a party of Indians was discovered in the act of catching some horses on the West Fork, above Clarksburg, and a company of men, led on by Colonel Lowther, went immediately in pursuit of them. On the third night the pursued and the pursuing parties, unknown to each other, encamped not far apart, and early in the morning the fires of the former being discovered by Elias Hughes, the detachment which accompanied him fired upon the Indian camp, and one of the savages fell. The remainder taking to flight, one of them passed near where Colonel Lowther and the balance of the party were; the colonel fired at him as he ran and he fell dead. The horses and plunder which had been taken by the savages were then collected by the whites and they commenced their return home, with too much confidence in their security. They had not proceeded far when two shots were unexpectedly fired at them, one of which took effect upon John Bonnet, who died before reaching home.

In August, 1789, five Indians, on their way to the settlements on the waters of the Morongahela, met with two men on Middle Island creek, and killed them. Taking their horses, they continued on their route until they came to the house of William Johnson, took Mrs. Johnson and her children prisoner, plundered the house, killed part of the stock, and taking with them one of Johnson's horses, returned to the Ohio river. At the time the Indians had arrived at the house, Johnson had gone to a lick not far off, and, upon his return in the morning, seeing what had been done, and searching until he had found the trail of the savages and their prisoners, he ran to Clarkburg for assistance. A company of men repaired with him immediately to where he had discovered the trail, and keeping it about a mile, four of the children lying dead in the woods. The savages had tomahawked and scalped them, and placing their heads close together, turned their bodies and feet straight out, so as to represent a cross. The fate of Mrs. Johnson is unknown.

In the spring of 1790, the neighborhood of Clarkburg was again visited by Indians in quest of plunder, who carried off several horses. They were discovered and pursued to the Ohio river, when the pursuers, being reinforced, determined to follow on over into the Indian country. Crossing the river, and ascending the Rockhocking, near the falls they came upon the camp of the savages. The whites, taking them by surprise, opened fire, which killed one and wounded others, and the remainder fled, leaving the horses in the camp. These were brought back and restored to their owners.

THE FATE OF JOHN MINTIRE AND WIFE

As John McIntire and his wife were returning home from a visit to a neighbor, in May, 1791, they passed through the yard of Urish Ashcraft. Soon afterward, Mr. Ashcraft was startled by the growling of one of his dogs, and hastening to the door, he opened an Indian. Closing the door, he screamed the alarm and endeavored to shoot the savage from a window, but his gun snapped. Observing other Indians close at hand, he shouted for help and they retreated. Three of McIntire's brothers coming up, Ashcraft explained the situation and the four started off in pursuit. About a mile from the house, they found the body of John McIntire, who had been killed and scalped. Concluding that Mrs. McIntire (whom they knew to have been with him) was taken prisoner, they went to Clarkburg for assistance to go to her rescue.

A company of eleven men started shortly afterward, in pursuit of the Indians, led by Colonel George Jackson and John Haymond, who traced them as far as Middle Island creek. Here six men - William Haymond (of Palatine), George Jackson, Benjamin Robinson, N. Carpenter, John Haymond and John Halbert - were chosen to go ahead of the horses and follow the trail. They soon came upon the savages and attacked them, mortally wounding one of them. After a short encounter the Indians fled, leaving their plunder behind them, and farther pursuit was abandoned. Among the articles which they left was the scalp of Mrs. McIntire, whose body was afterward found near that of her husband.

ATTACK ON CAPT. NICHOLAS CARPENTER AND PARTY

Nicholas Carpenter, who was a member of the first county court of Harrison county, in 1784, was a man of exemplary character, firm courage and sound judgment, and in looking over the old county records his name will be found frequently mentioned in connection with positions of trust. He was one of those men who seemed to be especially provided by Providence for the good of these pioneer communities, one hundred years ago, but his final fate was a sad one.

It was during the month of September, 1791, that a party of Indians crossed the Ohio, and captured a bright mulatto boy named Frank Wycoff, belonging to Captain Neal, of North Station, near the mouth of Little Kanawha. Proceeding on their way towards West Fork river, they came across the trail made by Captain Nicholas Carpenter, of Harrison county, in driving cattle to Marietta. Supposing it to be the trail of emigrants, they followed it. Captain Carpenter and his son, with five persons accompanying them, had crossed Bull creek and encamped on a run located half a mile from the Ohio river, six miles above Marietta, which has since been called "Carpenter's run." Being unconscious of the vicinity of the enemy, they lay down with their feet to the fire, not deeming it necessary to have one of their number as guard. At day-dawn Mr. Carpenter called up the men and was about commencing the usual morning devotions, when the Indians made the attack, and, taking them wholly by surprise, without having their fire-arms at hand, they were enabled to make little successful resistance. After firing a volley the Indians rushed upon them with the tomahawk. One of the party was killed at the first fire (Elihu, from Greenbush county), and one (John Paul) was wounded through the hand. One of the party, named Hughes, a skilled hunter and experienced with former encounters with the savages, seized Carpenter's rifle and his own, and springing through the woods, followed by the Indians. He fired one of the guns at his pursuers and threw it away. He was but partly dressed, his long leggings, fastened only by the belt at the top and loose below, greatly impeded his flight, and he found it necessary to stop for a moment and tear them off. This delay nearly cost him his life, as his pursuer, approaching within a few feet of him, threw his tomahawk with such accuracy as to graze his head. Freed from the incumbrance of his leggings, he soon left the foe far in the rear. John Paul also escaped by swimming. Bates, being slow of foot, after a brave resistance, with only his pocket-knife for a weapon, was killed and scalped. George Legal was pursued for over two miles, when he was overthrown and killed. Mr. Carpenter was a brave man, but being without means of defence, and unable to give timely warning to his men, he remained himself among the willows in the bed of the run with his little son. They were both much injured and killed. Perhaps by commencing the attack the Indians had secured the captives, Frank, by leaping through to a short sapling on an adjacent ridge. By great effort he released himself and hid. From his place of concealment he witnessed the escape of Hughes, and finally stealing away, returned to his master. After the affray was ended, the Indians (who were in command of the celebrated chief, Tecumseh, then a young man), collected the plunder of the camp, and retreated in such haste that they left all the horses, which had probably dispersed into the woods at the first sound of attack. Isaac Williams headed a party and made pursuit after them, but failing to overtake them, the party returned and buried the remains of Captain Carpenter, his son, and the other victims.

INCIDENTS IN THE LIFE OF JESSE HUGHES

The subject of this sketch was one of those bold pioneers who took a conspicuous part in the defence of the whites on the frontier against the Indians, and gained great celebrity for his courage and shrewdness. He was bred from infancy in the hot-bed of Indian warfare, and resided at Clarksburg. He was a light-built spare man, and became one of the most experienced backwoodsmen and Indian fighters of his day.

About the year 1790, some Indians one night, coming secretly upon the settlement at Clarksburg, stole some horses, and the next morning at daylight a party of twenty-five men, starting in pursuit, came upon the trail, and judged, by the appearance, there were only eight or ten of them. The captain and a company were in favor of pursuing the trail, but Hughes was opposed to this and advised them to let him pilot them by a near way to the Ohio, and intercept the Indians in their retreat. They would not listen to him, and he explained the danger of following the trail and exposing themselves to an ambush of the savages, who might thereby, after a destructive fire upon their pursuers, make their escape. The captain, jealous of Hughes' influence, broke up the council by exclaiming:

"All the men may follow me; let the cowards go home," and dashed off at full speed. Hughes felt the result, but followed with the others, and the result proved as he predicted. Two Indians in ambush, on the top of a cliff, fired and mortally wounded two of the party, while passing through a ravine, and then escaped. Now convinced of their error, they placed themselves under Hughes, but upon reaching the Ohio river, they found that the savages had crossed it. Hughes then got satisfaction of the captives by declaring that he would let who the cowards were, and calling for volunteers to follow him across the river in pursuit, they all refused. He then said he would go alone, and leave his scalp or bring one back with him. Alone he crossed the river, and the next morning came upon their camp when they were all absent hunting, except one Indian, who was left on guard. It was the work of a moment to shoot him, and with the scalp as trophy, he soon found his way back home, through seventy miles of wilderness.

At one time, when the frequent incursions of the Indians rendered it a season of great danger, and when the inhabitants of the neighborhood were taking refuge in the forts, Hughes one morning observed a lad seated upon the ground (inside the enclosure which stood in the vicinity of where the fair grounds are now located, on the river, at the western outskirts of Clatsburg), very intently fixing his gun, "Jim," said he, "what are you going to do?" "I am going to shoot a turkey that I hear gobbling over there on the hillside; listen, and you will hear it," replied Jim. "Well," said Hughes, after distinguishing the distant sound, "you stay here; I'll go and kill it." Jim, after considerable persuasion, knowing that Hughes was an expert marksman, consented to remain and let the latter go alone. Who, as he departed, promised to present him with the game. Hughes went out of the fort on the side that was furthest from the spot whence the sound proceeded, and took a shorter up the river, thence through a ravine and came in on the crest. Emerging safely up as he expected he sighted an Indian seated upon a stump, surrounded by sprouts, gobbling and intently watching for some one to come from the fort in quest of the supposed turkey. Before the Indian knew of his approach Hughes had shot him, and, taking his scalp went with it to the fort where Jim was waiting for his prize. Seeing no turkey, the lad impatiently exclaimed, "Now, why didn't you let me go, I could have hunted it as well as yourself." "Ah, but I didn't miss it," replied Hughes, throwing the scalp into his lap, "there's your gobbler's top knot, my boy." Jim's consternation may be imagined, as he witnessed this tangible proof of his narrow escape from the certain death that would have been his portion, but for the timely interference of the keen back-woodsman.

COL. WILLIAM LOWTHER.

Henry, George and William, were the sons of Henry Low, and were English miners; for their superior skill and meritorious service, "ther" was added to their name by royal edict. William had a son Robert, who, with his wife, Aquilla (Rees) Lowther, emigrated to America in 1740, and came to the Hacker Creek settlement in 1767, accompanied by their son William, (the subject of this sketch), who was born in 1742. The latter married Sudas Hughes, (sister of Elias, Jesse, Thomas and Job, of Indian war fame), and settled on Simpsons creek in 1772. Many of their descendants are now living in Clarksburg and the surrounding country.

William Lowther became distinguished as a skilled and courageous frontiersman, and for his unswerving devotion to the good of the colonists. The population of these frontier settlements increased so rapidly, and to such an extent that the supply of provisions proved insufficient, and the year 1773 was called, in the early traditions of the section, "the starving year." Such were the exertions of William to mitigate the sufferings of the people, and so great was his success, that his name is transmitted to their descendants followed by their blessings. During the war of 1774, and subsequently, he was the most active and efficient defender of the settlements in that vicinity against the savage foe, and many a successful expedition against them was commanded by him. He was one of the first justices of the peace in Harrison county, also the first sheriff of Harrison and Wood counties, and a delegate to the general assembly of the State. He also attained all the subordinate ranks in military service until promoted to that of colonel, and by his unassuming good qualities endeared himself to all with whom he became associated. He died October 28th, 1814.

CAPTURE OF LEONARD PETRO AND WILLIAM WHITE

Previous to 1777, the inhabitants of Tygart's valley had escaped the ill-effects of the enmity of the savages, they having made no incursions into that country since its permanent settlement had been effected, previous to the war of 1774. Notwithstanding this, the settlers exercised the utmost vigilance, not knowing at what time they might be called upon to protect themselves. Spies (or rangers) were continually employed to watch the Indian paths beyond the settlements for evidence of their approach, and if found to notify the inhabitants.

In September, 1777, Leonard Petro and William White, being engaged in watching the path leading up the Little Kanawha, killed a deer late in the evening, and taking a part of it with them, withdrew a short distance for the purpose of eating their supper and spending the night. Awaking about midnight, White discovered, by the light of the moon, that they were surrounded by Indians, seeing the impossibility of escape, and preferring captivity to death, he whispered to Petro to be still. The Indians sprang upon them, and White, raising himself on one leg hold of him, seized a blow with his tomahawk, suddenly concluding that he could escape if he succeeded in disabling his assailant. Missing his aim, he affected to have been ignorant of the fact that he was encountered by Indians, professed great joy at meeting with them, and declared that he was on his way to their towns. They were not deceived by the artifice, for, although he assumed an air of carelessness and glee that was calculated to win their confidence, yet the rueful countenance of poor Petro convinced them that White's conduct was feigned. They were therefore both tied for the night, and in the morning, White being painted red, and Petro black, they were forced to proceed to the Indian towns. When approaching a village, the whoop of success brought several to meet them, and on their arrival, they found that every preparation was made for their running the gauntlet, in going through which ceremony both were much bruised. White, however, did not remain long in captivity. Eluding their vigilance, he took one of their guns and began his flight homeward. Before traveling far, he met an Indian on horseback, whom he shot, and, mounting the horse from which he fell, he succeeded in returning to the valley without further adventure. Petro was never afterward heard from. In painting his body black, they had indicated their intention of killing him, and such, undoubtedly, was his fate.

The settlements generally enjoyed perfect quiet from the first appearance of winter until the return of spring. In this interval of time, the Indians were generally deterred from continuing their marauding expeditions, not only because of the increased danger of discovery, caused by the absence of foliage on the trees and shrubbery, and the ease with which they could be tracked in the snow, but on account of the suffering produced by their lying in wait and traveling in their partially unclothed condition, during the season of frequent intense cold. In consequence of this fact, the inhabitants greatly relaxed their vigilance at this season, and when, as upon rare occasions, the Indians did make inroads upon them, they would be taken by surprise.

SETTLEMENT AT NEAL STATION

The first settler, probably, in Wood county was Captain James Neal, who had been a citizen of Greene county, in that portion of Pennsylvania which had been supposed to have belonged to the colony of Virginia. He had served in the Continental army as captain in the Revolutionary war, and, upon receiving his discharge, had been paid for his services in the Continental currency. In the spring of 1783, he came to this section as deputy surveyor for Samuel Hanway, surveyor of the county of Monongalia, which at that time included a large extent of country. He surveyed, for Alexander Parker, of Parkersburg, Pennsylvania, the tomahawk run and pre-emption right made by Robert Thomson, which Mr. Parker had purchased, of the lands on which the city of Parkersburg now stands. Captain Neal was of Irish descent; his original name was O'Neal, and for one season, at the commencement of his services in the Continental army, he changed it to that of Neal.

In the fall of 1785, before any permanent settlements were made in the county, Capt. James Neal, with a party of men, descended the Monongahela and Ohio rivers, with the intention of proceeding to Kentucky. Arriving at the mouth of the Little Kanawha river, they wended it for a short distance, and taking the location, encamped on the south side, about a mile from its mouth where they remained. During the following winter they erected a block-house there which was afterward known in history as Neal's Station. Between that date and 1796, several block-houses were erected in this section and in Washington county, on the opposite side of the Ohio. These houses became the rendezvous of the few inhabitants who had settled here, while the war with the Indians was in progress. The lands around Neal's Station were afterward named "Morris," in honor of James Morris, then governor of Virginia, by Hugh Phelps, son-in-law of Capt. James Neal.

Early in the winter of 1784 he had learned the death of Mr. Neal's first wife, who was a daughter of Col.

John Harden of Kentucky. By this marriage he was the father of three sons - Henry, John and James Harden - and three daughters - Hannah (who married Col. Hugh Phelps), Nancy (who married Dr. Rowell), and Catherine (who married Joseph McCoy). After clearing some land and making other improvements, in the spring of 1786 he returned to Greene county, and in the summer of that year, married his second wife, Mary Phelps, a sister of his son-in-law, Col. Hugh Phelps. Early in the spring of 1787, with his family and all his children (both single and married), he moved to the station, and they became permanent settlers. He afterward held the office of justice of the peace, was commissioned captain of the Frontier Rangers, and appointed to many positions of honor and trust. He died at his residence at Neal Station, on February, 1822, in his 85th year, and his remains were buried in what is now known as Taverner's grave yard.

January 16, 1791, his daughter Mary was born, who was among the first white children born between Grave creek and Point Pleasant, in this State. March 25, 1811, she married Scarlet G. Foley, and became the mother of a large family of children. She died at her home on the place which her father had given her, two and one-half miles south of Parkersburg, September 1, 1870, in the eighteenth year of her age.

MR WOODS' TWO BOYS KILLED

In August, 1790, a party of Indians crossed the Ohio river a short distance below Parkersburg for the purpose of destroying Neal's Station, and capturing its inmates. While they were secreted in ambush a short distance up the run from the station, in the evening, two of Mr. Woods' boys, who lived in a small cabin about forty rods above the block-house (aged twelve and fifteen years), were returning home from a Saturday afternoon visit to the station. They went into the edge of the woods, on the outside of a cornfield, to look for the cows, and coming upon the Indians in their hiding-place, about dusk, they were traced and lured with the use of the tomahawk. The Indians were fearful that the screams the boys uttered before they were dispatched, would lead to their discovery, and they therefore gave up the main object of the expedition. They waited, however, until midnight, and attempted to set fire to the block-house by inclosing a brand of fire in dry poplar bark and pushing it through a porthole. It was discovered, however, and extinguished by Mrs. Neal, who gave the alarm, and pursuit was made as quickly as possible, without avail. The distracted parents of the children, as their boys did not make their appearance, dreaded the revelations which the appearance of daylight would disclose. Their worst apprehensions were realized by the discovery of the two scalped bodies in the morning.

MR. HEWITT TAKEN PRISONER

In May, 1792, while living at Neals Station, Mr. Hewitt rose early in the morning, and left the garrison, in search of a stray horse, little expecting any Indians to be near, as none had been seen in the vicinity for some time. While traversing an obscure cattle path, about a mile from the station, three Indians suddenly sprang upon him from behind trees, and being taken unawares, he was obliged to surrender. They crossed the Ohio river below Bedford, and after reaching a locality comparatively safe from pursuit, they halted to hunt and left their prisoner in camp. They had placed him upon his back, confined his wrists with stout thongs of raw-hide, to a sapling, and his legs, raised at a considerable elevation, to another small tree, using his great strength, he released himself soon after they were gone, and, taking two small pieces of venison, without arms, started for the Big Muskingum settlement. Although pursued by the Indians, he evaded their search, and, after nine days' wandering, came to the garrison at Wolf Creek Mills, on the Big Muskingum, nearly naked and famished. He soon recovered and returned to his family. About the year 1797, he removed, with his family, and settled in the Big Hocking valley, near Athens, Ohio. He was afterwards elected a trustee of Athens college.

KILLING OF HENRY NEAL AND MR. TRIPLETT

In the fall of 1792, Daniel Rowell, a son-in-law of Captain James Neal, and Mr. Neal's son Henry, accompanied by Mr. Triplett, left Neals Station and ascended the Little Kanawha forty miles in a canoe, to the mouth of Burning Springs run, now in Wirt county, on a hunting expedition. The evening on which they landed they prepared a camp, and Mr. Rowell took off the lock of his gun to examine the spring, when they heard what they supposed to be the sound of turkeys on the south side of the stream. Springing into their canoe, and thinking to secure some of them for supper, Mr. Neal and Mr. Triplett stood, while Mr. Rowell sat at the stern and paddled them quickly across. As the canoe struck the shore a fire from Indians in ambush (from whom had emanated the cry of the turkeys) instantly killed Neal and Triplett, whose bodies fell into the river. Mr. Rowell sprang over the stern of the canoe with his gun, and swam to the northern shore amidst a storm of bullets, the Indians pursuing him as the canoe. Upon reaching the shore, to facilitate his escape, he hid his gun (as he afterward said) under a white oak log on the Burning Spring run. From thence he went through a gap for a short distance from the river to elude his pursuers, and, changing his course, recrossed the river by swimming a few miles below where they had been surprised, and found his way to the station. Immediately raising a party, he went in pursuit of the Indians, but without avail, as too long a time had intervened, and they made good their escape. The bodies of Neal and Triplett, which were found in the river unscalped, and probably undiscovered by the Indians, were buried. It is supposed that this was the same party of Indians that was killed at Wheeling, a short time after, as they went in that direction, Daniel Rowell and his family went south here many years since, and settled in the new world. He died at the residence of his son, Dr. Neal Rowell, in Florence, Alabama, in 1851, aged 93 years. The gun hidden by Mr. Rowell was found, in a state of preservation sufficient for occupation, in 1858—sixty-seven years afterwards—and the remains of the white oak tree were then to be seen. The muzzle of the gun had been lost in a young dogwood, about six inches above the ground. The stock had decayed, but the barrel, trigger, guard, thumb and butt cover, on which the words "Liberty or Death" were engraved, were forwarded to Dr. Neal Rowell, at Florence, Alabama, in 1859.

THE SETTLEMENT OF BELLEVILLE

There are few if any bottom lands in the Ohio valley that excel in richness those known as Belleville. They are located in the south part of Wood county, extending about five miles along the river, commencing about sixteen miles below Parkersburg, opposite the mouth of Big Hocking river, Lee, the largest creek in the county, and draining its western portion, divides these lands into nearly equal parts, emptying into the Ohio. When George Washington located his lands, in 1771, he had reserved to him a part of this rich bottom. When his survey was made in after years, the back lines, as called for in the patent, passed through the central part, below Lee creek. When the firm of William Tilton & Co., of Philadelphia, in 1782, located and made the outlines of their large tracts of land in this county, then Washingtonia, amounting to over 1000 acres, this bottom was included in their survey by a prior patent to that of Washington's.

On a survey of James Crouch, the lands were patented by George III, signed by Lord Dunmore, governor of the colony of Virginia (November 15), and for the consideration of $1000. On December 15, 1782, a proclamation of George III, signed by Lord Dunmore, and commander-in-chief of our colony and dominion of Virginia, said proclamation bearing date February 19, 1784, for encouraging men to enlist in the service of our late royal grandfather, for the defence and security of the said colony. The original parchment patent is now in the possession of D. R. Neal, Esq., of Parkersburg, who owns a part of the land. The tract extends from opposite Hockingsport to below Belkville.

In the summer of 1783, Joseph Wood, of New Jersey, afterward known as Judge Wood, of Marietta, became the agent, surveyor, etc., for the colonization and sale of the lands of Tilton, Gibbs & Co., and the large tract at Belkville was selected as the place to commence their settlement. During the fall of that year a suitable boat was built, and under the direction of Mr. Wood, freighted with cattle, farming utensils, etc. Mr. Tilton and Mr. Wood, with four Scotch families as emigrants, and several men hired by the year, left Pittsburg on this boat, November 28, 1783, and stopping at Fort Harmar, at the mouth of the Big Muskingum, on the way, landed at Belleville, December 16th.

Captain Tilton and party having landed and secured their boat against dangers from ice and floods, selected a hard, dry bottom, on the bank of the river, for making a permanent settlement. Clearing was immediately commenced, and from the timber thus obtained a block-house was erected, twenty by forty feet, convenient to the river. It was built in the usual style of block-houses, with loop-holes for muskets. Early in January, 1784, the building was completed, and the entire company moved from the boat and took possession of their future home. A town was then laid out by Mr. Wood, and given the name of Belkville, and its lots were donated to actual settlers. Captain Tilton returned to Philadelphia, in the spring of 1784, leaving the settlement in charge of Mr. Wood, as sole manager and agent. During the first year about 1000 acres were cleared, ready for cultivation, and log houses for family residences, and out houses for stock, were erected near the block-house, the whole being enclosed by pickets about ten feet high, securely planted in the earth, forming a regular stockade, sufficient to accommodate about 200 persons. It was in the shape of an oblong square, with a river frontage of 100 feet, and running back 100 feet. A wicket gate in front, for access to the river, and a large one at either end for the admission of teams, etc., were built with secure fastenings.

The following are among the names of the Scotch families who first came with Mr. Wood, and those who came the following spring and settled at Belleville: McDonald, Greshouse, Tabor, James Penthewer, William Ingalls, Jerremson, Andrew McCash, and two single men, F. Andrews and Thomas Gilruth. In 1787 they were joined by the following persons: Joel and Joseph Dewey, from Wyoming, Pennsylvania; Stephen Sherrod and family, from the same place; Malcolm Colman and family, from Carlisle, Pennsylvania; Peter and Andrew Anderson, from above Wheeling, Virginia. Descendants from these last named families are still living in the south part of this county and in Jackson.

In the spring of 1785, a company of trappers and hunters from the vicinity of Wheeling, took possession of an abandoned Indian improvement of twenty acres above the mouth of Lee creek, erected a station house, and cultivated a tract in corn. It was then known as Flinn's Station. The company consisted of old Mr. Flinn, a widower, his two sons, Thomas and James, with their families; Mr. Farclmont, with wife and two sons, Jacob and John, John McCasack, and John Barnett, who married a daughter of Mr. Flinn. These people, in 1787, moved down to Belleville Station, thus adding strength to the protection against the Indians, who had commenced being troublesome, stealing stock and committing other depredations.

Joseph Wood, the agent of the Wilson lands, married Miss Margaret, a daughter of James Penthewer, one of the first Belleville colonists. In 1790 there was no one in the settlement authorized to administer the rules of community at that time, and they proceeded to "Farmer's Circle," in Belper, Ohio, where the ceremony was performed by Gen. Benjamin Tupper, a magistrate of that State. Mr. Wood resided in Marietta and vicinity, holding many positions of honor and trust until 1831, when he died, in the ninety-third year of his age.

David Lee, a hunter and trapper, some years prior to 1785, encamped upon the creek which afterward took his name, for the purpose of pursuing his calling. He continued to reside in that vicinity, and married a sister of Peter Anderson; afterward purchased and settled upon a piece of land on Tygart creek, and raised a family of five sons and three daughters. Mr. Lee was a native of Pennsylvania, and during his life here gained a wide reputation as a hunter and trapper. Many of his descendants are now residents of this section of the State.

JAMES KELLEY KILLED AND SON CAPTURED

During the fall of 1791, James Kelley, who, with his family resided at Belleville, while at work in his fields, was shot and scalped by a party of Indians. His oldest son, Joseph, who was with him, was captured and taken off by them to a Shawnee village in Ohio, where he remained until after the treaty of peace in 1795, when he was surrendered to Commander Return J. Meigs, and returned to his widowed mother, then residing at Marietta. He had been adopted by an aged Indian warrior, named Meshaleneac (who had lost five sons in battle), and received great kindness at his hands; he had, in fact, become so attached to his foster-father that he parted from him with sorrow. He finally settled in Marietta, raised a large family, and became respected and beloved.

STEPHEN SHERROD TAKEN PRISONER.

Late in the spring of 1792, Stephen Sherrod left the garrison at Belleville, and after feeding his hogs went into the woods to cut up exposed. While thus engaged, he was surprised and captured by a party of ten Indians and taken away a prisoner. His wife, who was a bold and courageous woman, left the garrison a short time after, to proceed a short distance for the purpose of milking the cows, and was seized by two of the Indians who intended to make her a prisoner also. She resisted, however, with so much force, and screamed so loudly, that they struck her suddenly with a blow from the tomahawk, and were about to proceed to scalp her, when a shot from the rifle of Peter Anderson, who had been attracted from the garrison by her cries, wounded the Indian in the arm, causing him to hastily retreat. Joshua Dewey immediately proceeded in a light canoe to Marietta, thirty miles away, returning in forty hours with Dr. James True. Mrs. Sherrod, who was pushed in the head in a shocking manner by the blow from the tomahawk, soon recovered under his treatment. The garrison at this time contained by five men, and it was therefore considered unsafe to pursue this party of Indians. Mr. Sherrod's captors crossed the Ohio on a raft, at the narrows above Belleville Bottom, and proceeded up the valley of the Big Hocking. Five Indians marched before the prisoner and five behind, his hands being tied with thongs of bear-skin, and in this manner he was hurried along until night, when they informed him that they had killed a woman at the garrison. With his hands still tied, they secured him to lie down at night upon his back, while they laid slender saplings across him, from head to foot, upon the ends of which they laid down to sleep. As soon as their heavy breathing indicated that they were sleeping soundly, he quietly released his hands, worked himself from under the saplings, and hastened down the valley, wading the river for some distance, and finally crossing it by swimming. Arriving at the Ohio river early the next morning, he located the garrison, who at once went to his rescue in a boat.

MILL CREEK TRAGEDY

and his son John, Elijah Poxey and James Ryan, left the garrison at Belleville, on a hunting expedition for the purpose of procuring meat. Descending the Ohio in a pirogue, to the mouth of Mill creek (now in Jackson county), they established a camp upon that stream, about four miles up, where they remained at night, after spending the day in hunting. Several days were thus passed very pleasantly, and, having good success, the pirogue was soon nearly filled with venison and bear meat. In the meantime, the water in the creek had fallen so low as to prevent them from getting the boat over the falls, above which they were lying, and the weather, which had been fine, suddenly set in cold, with a light fall of snow. John Coleman and Elijah Poxey returned to the garrison for a supply of flour and salt, and upon the third morning after their departure, Malcolm Coleman arose very early and prepared breakfast, anxiously awaiting their return. While invoking a blessing on their meal, the sharp crack of a rifle was heard, and a shot passed through his shoulder. Before his thoughts could be collected, the shot was quickly followed by another, which passed through his head, and he fell dead by the side of his companion, James Ryan, who made his escape from the Indians and returned to the garrison. On that day, Joshua Dewey made a journey to the camp, and upon his arrival at the spot, to his horror, found his old friend murdered, scalped and stripped of his clothing, and the camp plundered. Hastening back, he was the first to carry the painful intelligence to the garrison. A party of seven men at once proceeded to the camp in a canoe, but the Indians had taken the pirogue, loaded with the camp equipment, and effected a safe retreat, and after interring the remains of Mr. Coleman on the spot where he fell, they returned. The loss of this active and earnest Christian man was for a long time deeply mourned in the community.

In the summer of 1791, a small garrison of Virginia troops was stationed at Belleville and one at Parkersburg, under the direction of Col. Clendenin, to aid in the protection of settlers from Indian depredations.

MURDER OF THE FAMILY OF JOHN ARMSTRONG

Mr. Armstrong was a native of Pennsylvania, and moved with his family to Ohio in the autumn of 1793, residing in the block-house of Isaac Barker, a little above the head of Blennerhassett Island. He soon became interested, with Peter Mixer, in the small floating mill which was anchored in the current at the head of the island, near the Virginia shore. For convenience, they concluded to build for each of them a cabin on the Virginia side, a short distance above the mill, and move their families over. This was done, notwithstanding the earnest remonstrances of Mrs. Armstrong, who greatly feared the Indians. The close proximity of the gunson, on the opposite side of the river, and the block-house on the island, a short distance below, was deemed by the men to be a sufficient safeguard. After a time, for some reason, Mixer abandoned his first cabin, leaving it standing, and built another, about one hundred yards above, in the midst of the trees, where he removed his family. There was very little ground yet cleared, but Mr. Armstrong fenced a portion of this, in which he placed a cow and pigs, generally keeping them confined in a pen near the house.

On the night of the 24th of April, 1794, he was awakened by the barking of this faithful watch-dog, and from the fact that a bear had, a few nights before, attempted to carry off a pig, he supposed that the old marauder had returned. Without stopping to clothe himself, he seized his rifle, unbared the door and rushed to the aid of his dog, which was barking at some object which, owing to the darkness, he failed to recognize. Approaching nearer, he was able to discover three or four Indians, upon whom he instantly fired, rushed back to the house (giving the alarm as he ran), and barred the door. He hastened to the loft where three of the larger children slept (the two smaller ones, with the infant, lodging with himself and wife in the room below). The Indians, with a heavy mill, soon burst open the door and took possession of the house, and Mr. Armstrong, finding that it was impossible to make any successful resistance to protect his family, forced his way through the loose shingles of the roof, and jumping to the ground unseen by the Indians, hastened to the mill, where his two eldest boys, who aided in landing it, were sleeping. While the savages were breaking open the door, Mrs. Armstrong, with her infant in her arms, attempted to escape by climbing out through the low, unfinished chimney, which was made of logs, but, missing her footing, she fell back, breaking her leg in the fall. The Indians immediately tomahawked and scalped her, with the infant and two younger children, and finding in the loft, Jeremiah (about eight years old), John (aged ten), and Elizabeth (a girl of fourteen), they took them away as prisoners.

Mixer, in the meantime, hearing the report of a gun and the noise at Armstrong's cabin, came out to ascertain the cause, and hearing that they were Indians, called up his wife Mrs. Mixer having been a prisoner among the Wyandots, understood the language, and listening intently to the conversation of the savages, as they stood in the darkness, she heard them speculating as to where the family who had occupied the empty house could be. Mr. Mixer then lost no time in hastening them into his canoe and, paddling out into the river, floated silently by the desolate heart of his unfortunate neighbor, undiscovered.

Landing his family on the island, he gave the alarm about the same time that Armstrong did, and early in the morning, as soon as it was light enough to see, a party went to the scene of the past night's adventure and brought the remains across the river and buried them. The noble dog, with his lower jaw nearly severed by a blow from a tomahawk, in his encounter with an Indian, was found fortuitously watching over the dead. A party of twenty men from the island and Farmers Castle, went in pursuit of the Wyandots, whom they afterward ascertained were about twenty in number, and had been out on a marauding expedition in the vicinity of Chakbung. Their trail was followed to where they raised their sunken canoes, whence they crossed the Ohio to the Big Rocking, up which they pushed their boats for several miles, when they left them and traveled by land. The party in pursuit ascertained by the prints of the children's feet in the mud that they were yet alive, and fearing to jeopardize their lives by following them they returned down the stream in the bark canoes left by the Indians.

The children were adopted into different families, upon their arrival at the Wyandot town. Jeremiah, the youngest, whose life had been spared at the earnest solicitation of a young warrior of the party, was adopted by the celebrated chief, Crane, who was kind-hearted, and became attached to him. A portion of the time of his captivity was spent where the city of Columbus now stands, which tract was claimed by this tribe. In after years he kept a tavern in that city, and subsequently resided in Havana, Licking county, Ohio. He and John were released at the close of the war, which occurred a little over a year after their capture. Elizabeth, several years afterward, married a man named Dobson, and settled near Malden, Upper Canada.

ISAAC WILLIAMS, THE NOTED SPY AND HUNTER

The pioneers of this section of country were especially noted for their courage, hardihood and generous hospitality. They were ever ready to succor to the traveler a hearty welcome to their rude cabins or their hunter's camps in the forest, and share with them anything which they might contain. Tools, provisions and common dangers became a bond of attachment between them.

For the purpose of aiding in the safety and defense of the early settlers, the House of Burgesses of Virginia commissioned a number of hunters and spies, whose duty it was to discover and trace the course of the Indians in their raids, give warning to the settlers, and otherwise aid them, to the best of their ability. Among those thus employed was Isaac Williams, who spent his last years as a citizen of this county. He was born in Chester county, Pennsylvania, July 16, 1727, and when quite a youth, his parents moved with him to Winchester, Virginia, where he grew up to young manhood, developing fondness and appetite for trapping and hunting. At the age of eighteen, the Colonial government of Virginia appointed him a ranger, to watch the movements of the Indians on the frontier. In this capacity he served the State in the disastrous campaign of Braddock, in 1754. He was also one of the rangers who assisted in guarding the first convoy of provisions and ammunition to Fort Duquesne, after it had been captured by Gen. Forbes, of Pennsylvania, in 1758, who changed its name to Fort Pitt. At that time the western part of the State of Pennsylvania was supposed to belong to the colony of Virginia, but the final completion of the survey of the Mason and Dixon line gave it to that State.

The ten years following were spent by him in hunting and trapping on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers and their tributaries. He conducted his parents over the mountains from Winchester, in 1768, and settled them on Buffalo creek, near West Liberty, in what is now Brooke county, West Virginia. He accompanied Ebenezer and Jonathan Zane, in 1769, in their expeditions around Wheeling, Zanesville and other locations west of the mountains, and by other hunting and trapping excursions became thoroughly acquainted with the topography of the Ohio river and its tributaries, and entered several tomahawk rights, which he sold. In 1774, he accompanied Gov. Dunmore, in his expedition against the Shawnees, then at war with the colonies, under the leadership of the great chieftain Cornstalk and was with him when he concluded the treaty of peace near Chillicothe, after the battle of Point Pleasant, that year, in which the Colonial forces under Gen. Lewis were engaged.

In 1775 he met and married Mrs. Rebecca Martin, of Grove creek, whose former husband had been killed by the Indians on Big Hocking, in 1770. She was the daughter of Joseph Tomlinson, born at Walk creek, on the Potomac, Maryland, February 14, 1754, in 1771 she accompanied her two brothers, Samuel and Joseph, to Grove creek on the Ohio river, and for several years continued as their housekeepers. In 1783 her brothers, while engaged in trapping near the mouth of the Big Muskingum, preempted for her 400 acres of land on the opposite side of the Ohio, in Virginia, and cleared four acres, on which they raised a crop of corn and built a cabin that year. This land afterward became very valuable, owing to the fertility of the soil.

Williamstown now occupies a part of it, and the balance has been divided into farms, which are in a high state of cultivation.

Post Harmer having been established at the mouth of the Muskingum river, and garrisoned by the United States troops, Isaac Williams arrived with his family and settled on this tract belonging to his wife, March 24, 1787. Soon after their arrival their only child, a daughter, was born, whom they named Abigail. This daughter married John G. Henderson, who came to Wood county in 1787, in company with Robert Triplett.

Mr. Williams, after his arrival here, discontinued his hunting and trapping expeditions, excepting as a recreation, and devoted his attention almost entirely to the cultivation and improvement of his farm. He succeeded in making it one of the most productive and attractive places in the country, and his mansion became far famed as a place of pleasant resort for his neighbors and friends, and strangers were treated with the most generous hospitality.

His disposition is fully illustrated by the fact that in 1790 when the inhabitants in the new settlements of the Ohio Company began to suffer from the want of food, and were reduced nearly to the verge of starvation, and corn, from its scarcity, became a great luxury, Mr. Williams, by his industry, had laid by an abundance. Speculators, eager to take advantage of the necessities of the distressed people, and anxious to turn an honest penny, offered him one dollar and a quarter per bushel for all he had to spare, and urged upon him to set a price, intimating that he could demand of them nearly any price he chose. But he turned from them with indignation, and sent them off without a bushel. With the exception of a scant supply for his own use, this corn was divided among needy applicants, whose empty purses were no bar to their obtaining what they needed, and when able to pay only fifty cents per bushel would be accepted. The reader can, perhaps, imagine the amount of relief caused by this generous act, to the scores of hungry settlers, who had been almost starved, trying to subsist on mouldy corn, which had been hard to obtain at as high as two dollars per bushel. The position which Mr. Williams held in the hearts of the people was one to be envied. It is sufficient to say of his wife that she emulated him in his kindly acts. This modern "Isaac and Rebecca" rivalled their scriptural namesakes in noble deeds. Many years before his death Mr. Williams liberated all his slaves, six or eight in number, and by his will left valuable tokens of love and good feeling for the oppressed and despised African. He died September 25, 1820, aged eighty-four years.

For many years during his early manhood Mr. Williams served as a ranger and spy, and by his skill, accompanied by his generous and courageous qualities, gained a national reputation, had few equals and no superiors. An interesting volume might be written of his life and adventures. In his dangerous expeditions against the Indians he was the frequent companion of Lewis Wetzel, Kent, and other noted rangers. His remains, with those of his battle-battered and beautiful spouse upon the plantation. Upon the death of Mrs. Williams this place descended to decre to John A. Kinnard, who had married Mary Tomkinson, the sixth child of Joseph and Elizabeth Tomkinson, of Grove creek, a niece of Mrs. Williams. Mr. Kinnard, with his young wife, settled upon the farm in 1807. He lived, during his life, many positions of trust, and died at Parkersburg, May 2, 1850, in his seventy-third year. His wife died at the residence of her daughter, Mrs. Gardner, in Parkersburg, March 16, 1873, aged eighty-seven.

ONE OF BIRD LOCKHART'S INDIAN ADVENTURE

In the autumn of 1793, Mr. Williams had been sick, but recovering, and feeling a returning appetite, he determined to procure some venison, of which he was very fond. Living in his garrison with his wife and children, was Bird Lockhart, a courageous man and a celebrated hunter, who was readily induced to try and procure the game, although at that time the venture was especially hazardous, on account of the proximity and savage spirit of the Indians. Taking his old horse, which was so afflicted with the pole-evil, and used up in general, that there was no danger of the Indians coveting the possession of him, he went to the head of Worthington run, six miles from the garrison, where he soon killed two fine deer, and had them dressed and packed upon the old horse. Late in the afternoon, as he was traversing his way towards home, along a winding ridge, in a curve of an old Indian path, he suddenly discovered two of the savage warriors only a few rods ahead of him. The Indians were so much surprised at himself, and both parties sprang behind trees. In his haste one of the savages wheeled a tree too small to cover his body, a part of which being exposed, Lockhart quickly shot him through the hips, completely disabling him. Knowing Bird's gun to be empty after the shot, the other Indian, who was some distance off, rushed up to shoot him. Lockhart, however, with the rapidity of lightning had reloaded before the Indian could get a fair sight of him, who, observing him withdrawing his ramrod, returned on horse to his tree. Here they remained until dark, watching each other closely, when Lockhart, placing his beaver upon the end of his wiping stick, slowly pushed it around the side of the tree, calling the fire of his enemy, whose rifle ball pierced the hat. Still further to deceive him, he let it fall to the ground, when, with a yell the savage sprang forward to secure his scalp. Leaving him approach to within a few yards, he deliberately stepped out and shot him through the body. His horse had in the meantime strayed off, and he took a circuit round in search of him, but not finding him, he returned to the garrison. The next morning Lockhart conducted a party to the scene of the previous night's adventures, where they found the dead body of the last Indian which had been shot, but the first one was missing. After searching found the old horse on Carpenters run, about six miles up the river. It was supposed that the wounded Indian had found the animal, and, riding him to this point, had crossed the river, aided by his friends, or hidden himself in the rocks. Hence Williams got no venison, but he forgot his loss in listening to the story connected with it.

JOSHUA FLEEHART

Joshua Fleehart was born on the frontiers in Pennsylvania, and from boyhood had been brought up in the woods, knowing as little in the way of "book learning" as the Indian. He had a powerful frame, over six feet in height, with muscular limbs. He was the most noted among all the backwoodsmen of this vicinity for his tact in following the trail of an Indian or wild beast through the forest, and it is said of him that fear was a sensation which he never experienced. His skill in the art of hunting seemed almost superhuman. He always went dressed similar to an Indian, with moccasins and leather leggings. The rifle which he carried was one of the largest caliber, and, like himself, unusually lengthy, and so heavy that few men could hold it steadily in the position for firing. It did wonderful execution, however, in his powerful grasp, and with it he could hit a small object at 100 yards with certain accuracy.

At the breaking out of the Indian war, he lived with his wife and four children, on what was afterward known as Blennerhassett island. Having become widely celebrated as an expert hunter, he was induced to go to Farmer Leslie, below Harper, to reside, for the purpose of supplying the settlers with game. The near proximity of the Indians never deterred him from hunting in the forest, and if an alarm was given while he was inside the garrison, of the approach of the savage, he would take his trusty rifle and sally out into the woods, to watch their motions and try and obtain a shot at one of them. He claimed that he could be of more assistance in this way, and felt freer and more at home when behind a tree, fighting Indians, than when confined behind the shelter of a block-house. He soon tired of garrison life, however, and late in the fall of 1793, started all alone upon a hunting expedition, penetrating about twenty miles into the territory occupied by the Indians as their best hunting grounds. He was gone fully three months, returning the latter part of February, with his canoe heavily and richly laden with valuable skins and spoils which he had captured in his successful encounters with the Indians, including various silver ornaments.

DEATH OF CHARLES KELLY AND OTHERS

When information of the hostile deportment of the Indians, in 1774, reached Williamsburg, Col. Charles Lewis sent a messenger with the intelligence to Capt. John Stuart, requesting him to apprise the inhabitants on the Greenbrier river anticipated, and to send out scouts to watch the warren's path beyond the settlements. The captain thereupon used the utmost vigilance to prevent the re-enactment of those scenes which had been previously witnessed on Muddy creek and in the Big Levels, but it could not avail to altogether repress them. In the course of the preceding spring, some few had commenced making improvements on the Kanawha river, below the Great falls, and some land adventurers had begun to examine and survey the adjacent country. To these men, Capt. Stuart dispatched an express, informing them of the re-opening of Indian hostilities, and advising them to remove to a place of greater security. When this express arrived at the cabin of Walter Kelly, twelve miles below the falls, Capt. John Field, of Culpepper (who had been in active service during the French war, and was then engaged in making surveys), was there with a young Scotchman and a negro woman, Kelly immediately sent his family to Greenbrier, under the care of a younger brother, but Capt. Field, deeming the apprehension groundless, determined to remain with Kelly, the Scotchman and negro woman also remaining.

Soon after the family had left the cabin, and while yet within hearing distance of it, a party of Indians approached, unperceived, and came near Kelly and Field, who were engaged in drawing leather from a tan-bough in the yard. The first intimation of their approach was the discharge of several guns, when Kelly fell. Field then ran huskily toward the house in quest of his gun, but recollecting that it was unloaded, sprang into a cornfield, which screened him from the observation of the Indians, who, supposing that he had taken shelter in the house, rushed into it. Here they found the Scotchman and negro woman, the latter of whom they killed; and making prisoner of the young man returned and scalped Kelly.

When Kelly's family reached the Greenbrier settlement, they reported having heard the firing of guns in the direction of their home, and expressed their apprehension of the danger to those they left behind. Capt. Stuart thereupon assembled a number of volunteers and started to their relief. They had not gone far before they met Capt. Field, who clothes were almost entirely torn off from him, and who was nearly exhausted from hunger and fatigue, caused by his flight of eighty miles through the thick underbrush. Considering it unwise to proceed further, the party returned.

A few weeks afterward, another band of Indians came to the settlement on Muddy creek, and meeting a daughter of Walter Kelly, who was out walking with her uncle, near the house (which had been converted into a temporary fort), they fired upon them when the latter was killed, and the young lady, being overtaken in her flight, was carried off into captivity.

BATTLE NEAR POINT PLEASANT, AND ATTACK ON FORT DONNELLY

The Shawnees had determined to avenge the death of their Sachem Cornstalk, and in the spring of 1778, a small band of them made their appearance near the fort at Point Pleasant, when Lieut. Moore was dispatched, with a few men, to drive them off. The Indians commenced retreating, and the lieutenant, fearing they would escape, ordered a quick pursuit. He did not proceed far before he fell into an ambuscade, he and three of his men were killed at the first fire, and the rest of the party saved themselves by a rapid flight to the fort.

In the following May, an attempt was made to repeat this operation, and a party of Indians again came within view of the fort, but Capt. McKee (who was at that time in command) forbore to detach any of his men to go in pursuit of them. Disappointed in their expectations, the Indians suddenly arose from their covert and presented an unbroken line, ascending in front of the fort from the Kanawha to the Ohio river. The garrison at this time was small, owing to the absence of Capt. Arbuckle's company, the Indians demanded a surrender, which proposition Capt. McKee asked until morning to consider, and the night was spent in bringing a supply of water from the river and making other preparations for defense. In the morning the captain sent the answer (that the demand would not be complied with) by the "grenadier squaw," Cornstalk's sister, who remained attached to the whites, (notwithstanding the murder of her brother and nephew, Hinnepco), and acted as interpreter at the fort. The Indians immediately commenced the attack, and for a week kept the garrison closely besieged, when, failing to accomplish their object, they collected all the cattle they could find, and proceeded up the Kanawha, toward the Greenbrier settlement.

Appreciating the danger and the disastrous consequences of a surprise to the people of that community, Capt. McKee called for volunteers to undertake the hazardous enterprise of passing by the Indians to Col. Andrew Donnelly's (then the frontier house) and give the alarm. John Pryor and Phillip Hammond expressed themselves as willing to risk their lives to save the people of Greenbrier, and were immediately painted and disguised as Indians by the "grenadier squaw," and started upon their perilous journey. Traveling night and day with great rapidity, and making a detour, they passed the Indians at Meadow river, and arrived at Donnelly's fort, twenty miles farther on, at sunset of that day.

The intelligence was immediately spread through the neighborhood, a messenger was sent to Capt. John Stuart, water and supplies were carried into the fort, and every possible arrangement made for the reception of the enemy. Early the next morning John Fricbet, a servant to Col. Donnelly, went into the yard for some firewood, and was instantly killed by a rifle shot. Two Indians then ran into the yard and tried to force open the kitchen door, but it was secured by Hammond and Pointer, who were on guard. The savages then commenced cutting the door in pieces with their tomahawks, and Hammond, finding they would soon succeed, threw it suddenly open, killed one Indian on the threshold, and discharged his musket, heavily loaded with iron shot, into the dense crowd of savages congregated there, who fell back in dismay, and the door was again secured. The men in the house (who were asleep at the opening of the attack) were by this time aroused, and commenced a rapid fire from the openings in the second story, when the enemy retired to a safe distance. A number of Indians, however, had succeeded in getting under the floor and attempted to gain admittance by raising up the puncheons, of which it was made; in this they were quickly aided by the whites, who tore up a part of the floor and succeeded in killing several of the savages before they could escape.

When the intelligence of the approach of the savages reached Capt. Stuart, Col. Samuel Lewis was with him, and they both exerted themselves to collect the inhabitants into the fort where Lewisburg now stands. Having succeeded in this, two scouts were sent to Donnelly's to ascertain what was transpiring, who soon returned and gave information of the Indian attack there. Volunteers were then called for, and in a brief space of time, a company of sixty-six brave men were marching by the most direct route to the relief of the Donnelly fort, under the leadership of Col. Lewis and Capt. Stuart. By approaching the fort at the rear, they escaped an ambuscade that had been laid by the savages in anticipation of the arrival of reinforcements, and, creeping through a field of rye, they made a run for the house, amid a storm of bullets from the enemy (who discovered them when they broke cover), and were soon safely within the walls. The Indians then renewed the attack, continuing until dark, when they retreated, dragging off their slain.

In this encounter, only four of the whites were killed, while it was known that the enemy lost over thirty. The garrison numbered twenty-one, before the reinforcements came, and these men had sustained the brunt of the battle against an enemy party of over two hundred. This fact illustrates the want of good gunneryship on the part of the Indians, and the excellent judgment and bravery of the prisoners. Nearly all the successful attacks of the Indians were made upon isolated and defenceless families, or upon small settlements, when they were enabled to take them by surprise. On the morning after the Indians departed, Capt. Hamilton went in pursuit of them with seventy men, but, following two days without apparently gaining upon them, the chase was abandoned.

OTHER DEPREDACTIONS IN THE VALLEY

After this attack on Donnelly's fort, the Indians attempted no more mischief in the Greenbrier country for about two years. The fort at Point Pleasant guarded the principal pass to the settlements on the Kanawha, in the levels and on Greenbrier river, but in the spring of 1780, when preparations were being made for an attack against the whole border country, a party of savages was dispatched to this section for the purpose of rapine and murder, and to ascertain the facilities of the inhabitants to resist invasion.

This party consisted of twenty-two warriors, and their first act of atrocity was at the house of Lawrence Drinnan, a few miles above the Little Levels, where Henry Baker was killed near the river. Mr. Drinnan dispatched a servant to spread the alarm, who collected twenty men, two of whom were killed, as they were proceeding toward Drinnan's, by the savages, who lay in ambush awaiting them. The Indians then proceeded to the house of Hugh Melver, whom they killed, and made his wife prisoner. Mental John Piner with his wife and child, the former was killed and the latter two taken prisoner, and probably murdered, as they were never afterward heard from. The other victims in the neighborhood were a man named Monday and his wife, who were slain, and Mrs. Smith, Mrs. Thomas Drinnan and a child, who were taken prisoner. These were the last outrages committed by the Indians in the Greenbrier settlements.

ENLEN'S LEAP

In the spring of 1781, Benjamin Eden, who was at that time insane, was out hunting in the woods below

Point Pleasant, when he was discovered and pursued by an Indian. Throwing away his elegant deer-mounted rifle, in order to gain time by arresting the attention of the Indian (who stopped to pick it up), he used his utmost exertions in running; and unexpectedly came to a precipice, over which he fell headforemost through a buckeye tree, sinking a branch which turned him over, and he landed upon his feet unhurt, although the fall was fifty-three feet. Blindly rushing in his excitement toward the river he leaped another precipice twelve feet in height, and escaped. The scene of this occurrence is within sight of the town of Point Pleasant, and of steamers passing along the Ohio river.

that the barrel into which the scalp were thrown was filled with these horrid trophies. He remained with the Indians two years, during which he learned their language and acted as interpreter between them and the traders. He at length made his escape, and lived with a trader until after Wayne's victory, when he returned home. While at Detroit, he became acquainted with the notorious Simon Girty, then a British prisoner for services in the Revolution. He said Girty was an affable man, but extremely intemperate. Girty denied to him that he was the instigator of the death of Col. Crawford; but that he went so far to save him that his own life was in danger.

MURDER OF RHODA VAN BEBBER

A few years after the close of the Revolution, a daughter of Capt. John Van Bebber, named Rhoda, aged seventeen, and Joseph Van Bebber, a lad of thirteen, a brother of Capt. Jesse and John Van Bebber, had crossed over in a canoe one morning, to the west side of the Ohio, opposite Point Pleasant, on an errand to Rhoda's father, then living temporarily in a house on that side of the stream, when a party of Indians suddenly made their appearance. Dave, a black man belonging to Capt. Van Bebber, gave the alarm and rushed into the house. The Indians attacked the house, but were driven off by Dave and Capt. Van Bebber, with the loss of two or three of their number. Joseph and Rhoda, in their terror, hastened to the canoe, whether the Indians pursued them, killed and scalped the young lady, and took Joseph a prisoner to Detroit. Rhoda's scalp the Indians divided into two, and sold them to the Indian traders at Detroit for thirty dollars each; the object in purchasing them was to encourage the savages in their incursions, as to prevent a settlement of the country by the whites, and thus monopolize the Indian trade. Joseph afterward stated in the autumn of 1788 or '89, Mathias Van Bebber, aged eighteen, and Jacob, aged twelve years, were out a short distance from Point Pleasant, with a horse, when they were waylaid by four Indians. Jacob was a short distance ahead with a rifle across his shoulder, when the Indians fired two guns at Mathias. One of the balls struck him over the eye, and rendered him momentarily blind; he sprang to one side and fell into a gully. The boy, Jacob, on hearing the report of the guns, fled, and three of the Indians went in pursuit. Mathias, in the meantime, sprang up and took to a tree, the remaining Indian doing the same. Mathias brought up his gun to an aim, the Indian dodged, and the former took the opportunity and escaped into the fort. The Indians, after a close chase of half a mile, caught the lad, who, being very active, would have escaped into the fort had his suspensions not been too large. The Indians retreated across the Ohio with their prisoner, who was a sprightly little fellow, small of his age, and the Indians, pleased with him, treated him kindly. On the first night of their encampment they took him on their knees and sang to him, and he turned away his head to conceal his tears. On arriving at their town, while running the parent between the children of the place, one Indian boy, much larger than himself, threw a bone which struck him on the head. Enraged by the pain, Jacob drew back and running with all his force butted him over, much to the amusement of the Indian warriors. He was adopted into an Indian family where he was used with kindness, on one occasion his Indian father whipped him, though slightly, which affected his Indian mother and sister to tears. After remaining with the Indians about a year, he escaped, and for five days traveled through the wilderness to his home. When he had arrived at maturity, he was remarkable for his fleetness. None of the Indians who visited Point Pleasant could ever equal him in that respect.

THE VAN BEBBER BOYS

LAST INDIAN INCURSION

The last incursion made by the Indians into this section was in May, 1791, when a party of eighteen whites were attacked by about thirty Indians at a point on the Ohio river about one mile north of the fort at Point Pleasant. The whites were defeated. Michael See and Robert Sinclair were killed and Thomas Norrump Hampton and a black boy belonging to See were borne off prisoners. William See, son of Michael See, was born in the fort at Point Pleasant the same evening that his father was killed. The black boy never returned; he became an Indian chief and took part with the friendly Indians against the British during the war of 1812-14. William went as a volunteer with Mason County Riflemen to the Northwest in 1813, and there met the colored chief, with whom he became acquainted, and was informed by him that the Indian who shot his father at Point Pleasant twenty-two years before was still living, and then in the immediate vicinity, but very old and infirmly blind. See desired to be shown him, but the chief, fearing that he would avenge the death of his father, refused to reveal his whereabouts.

CAPTURE OF THE MISSES TYLER

About the year 1792 there resided within the fort at Point Pleasant, a family of the name of Tyler, in which were two young ladies. It was customary at that time to put bells upon the cows and permit them to graze without the stockade, into which, however, they were driven at night. One evening in the autumn of the year, these ladies left the fort for the purpose of driving in the cows, and hearing the bells on the hill in the rear of the fort, they proceeded in the direction from which the sound came until they reached the summit of the hill, when several Indians, who had taken the bells from the cows and were using them as a decoy, rushed upon the ladies and made them prisoners, and, having cut the skirts from their dresses that they might travel the more rapidly, at once began the long and tedious journey to Detroit, where shortly after their arrival, the younger died of a broken heart. The older remained a prisoner until after Wayne's treaty in 1795, when she was married to a French trader in Canada, after which she returned to Point Pleasant and spent six months with her friends, then bidding all a final adieu, she departed to again join her husband, who awaited her arrival at Detroit, from which place they removed to Montreal, where she died at an advanced age.

THOMAS TEAYS

Among the earliest settlers who entered land in the valley was Thomas Teays, who located no less than twenty-seven thousand acres, in which tract nearly the entire region now known as Teays valley was embraced. This valley was named from its first owner, and is the best agricultural land in Putnam county. While Mr. Teays and his party were surveying his lands, one evening after they had gone into camp and were preparing supper, they were much alarmed at beholding several wrecks approaching the camp. The Indians, probably finding the party stronger than they expected, halted within speaking distance, while one of them advanced to the camp and asked for salt. Mr. Teays gave him the vessel containing their entire supply, and requested him to take half it contained. The Indian having done so returned thanks, and after dividing with his comrades, all moved off. The next year, while Mr. Teays was completing his surveys, near the mouth of Coal River, he was captured by a moving band of Indians and carried a prisoner to the Shawnee towns, about the time that the prisoners from the command of the ill-fated Col. Crawford were being brought in, and he, with them, was condemned to be burned at the stake. While the fires were being kindled, Mr. Teays observed an Indian sitting a small way off, apparently engaged in deep meditation. But the awful moment was come. The most fearful and heart-rending scene upon which the sun had ever shone was now to be enacted. Those familiar with the heart-rending story of the burning of Col. Crawford can imagine the horrid scene. The prisoners, one after another, were bound to the stakes; and it now came the turn of Mr. Teays. But as he was being led forward by his executioners, the Indian above referred to rushed between them, and, exclaiming, "This man Indian's friend! he gave Indian salt," severed the bonds and led the prisoner away. Thus, by giving the Indian a little salt a year before, was he saved from the awful fate of being burned at the stake. He was adopted into the family of the Indian, with whom he spent more than three years. He then made his escape, and returned by way of the Kanawha valley to his home in Campbell county, Virginia, where he lived to a ripe old age, but never returned to the valley. His lands descended to his heirs, many of the descendants of whom yet reside within the valley and upon the lands included within "Teays' grant."

NORTHWESTERN VIRGINIA: ATTACK ON PART WHEELING

erected by government authority, and supplied with arms and ammunition from the public arsenal, it was not garrisoned by regular soldiers, in 1777, as were other State forts on the Ohio river; its sole defense was left to the freedom and bravery of those who might seek shelter within its walls. The settlement around it was at this time flourishing, and its growth had been exceedingly rapid since the first coming of the Zanes and others, in 1769; a lively little village of about thirty houses had sprung up, where but a few years prior the foot of civilized man had never trod, and now domestic flocks and herds were quietly feeding upon the hills that had so recently been occupied by wild beasts of the forest. But the peace of the little community was soon to be broken.

On the night of the 1st of September, 1777, Capt. Ogil (who had for some time been engaged, with a party of twelve men in watching the paths leading to the settlement) came into Wheeling and reported that no enemy was near. In the course of the night, however, an Indian army, consisting of 389 warriors, approached the village, and fearing, from seeing the lights at the fort, that the settlers would be prepared for an attack, placed themselves in ambush. Two lines were formed, some distance apart, extending from the river across the point to the creek, with a corn field in afford concealment. Six Indians were then stationed near a road leading through the field to the fort, about midway between these two lines, in a situation exposed to observation, for the purpose of deceiving within the lines any force which might come out to attack them.

Early in the morning, two men, going to a field for horses, passed the last line, and came near to the Indians posted in the center, suddenly perceiving the men, however, they endeavored to escape by flight. A single shot brought one of them down, and the other was allowed to escape, that he might give the alarm. Learning there were but six of the enemy, Capt. Mason, at the head of fourteen men, started for the place where they had been seen. He had not proceeded far from the fort before he perceived a body of savages. Observing the impossibility of maintaining a conflict with them, he immediately endeavored to retreat with his men to the fort, but as soon as they were literally cut to pieces. Capt. Mason and his sergeant, however, succeeded in passing the front line, but were pursued and fired at as they were ascending the hill. The sergeant fell, so crippled by a ball that he could not proceed, and handed his gun to his captain as he passed by (who had lost his own in his flight), and calmly resigned himself to his fate.

The captain, though twice wounded, and greatly exhausted from the loss of blood, pressed forward, with all his remaining energy, for the fort. As the foremost pursuer was about to bury his tomahawk in his skull, he quickly wheeled and raised his gun, but the enemy was too close to allow him to take aim; having the advantage of higher ground, however, he staggered him backward by a blow with his fist. The uplifted tomahawk descended to the ground, and before the Indian could recover, the ball from the captain's gun had done its errand, and he fell lifeless to the earth. The captain could proceed but a few steps farther, and he then concealed himself beside a large fallen tree, where he fortunately remained unobserved while the Indians remained about the fort.

The cries of Capt. Mason's men, and the discharge of fire-arms, induced Capt. Ogle to hasten to their relief with his twelve mounts, being some distance in the rear of his men. The Indians, in closing around them, left him without the circle, and he concealed himself in some bushes in the corner of the house, where he remained until the next day. The same fate awaited his men that had fallen the others, of the twenty six who were led out of the fort only three escaped death, and two of these were badly wounded.

During the occurrence of these events the inhabitants of the village were busily employed in removing to the fort, and preparing for its defence, as it was soon discovered that the Indians were there in large force, and it would be impossible to maintain an open contest with them. So quickly had these events transpired, that the gates of the fort were scarcely closed before the Indian army appeared under its walls, ready to attempt its reduction by storm. Before an assault was commenced, however, the renegade, Simon Girty, stepped forward and demanded a surrender. He informed the inmates of the fort that he was present, with a large army, to escort to Detroit such of the inhabitants along the frontier as were willing to accept the terms offered by Gov. Hamilton to those who would renounce the cause of the colonists and show their allegiance to Great Britain. He read Gov. Hamilton's proclamation, and urged the folly of resistance, threatening those who persisted in it with all the horrors which the savages at his back were capable of perpetrating. He allowed them only fifteen minutes in which to decide, which was fourteen minutes more time than was required. Col. Zane immediately replied that "they had consulted their wives and children, and they were unanimously resolved to perish rather than place themselves under the protection of a savage army, with the price of barbarians at its head, or relinquish the cause of liberty." Girty then urged them to take more time for consideration, representing in glowing colors their terrible fate if they resisted; he was interrupted by a shot from the fort as a warning, when he withdrew, and the assault immediately commenced.

There were but thirty-three men in the fort to defend it against the attack of over three hundred and eighty Indians, and for twenty-three hours they bravely held out against this superior force, and all the art, fury and cunning which it could bring to bear to accomplish their destruction, this defence was one of the stout noble and heroic in the annals of border-warfare. Within the fort, each had a duty to perform.

and promptly and faithfully was it discharged; the more expert of the women (among whom were Mrs. Glum and Betty Wheel) took their stations and used the rifle with the skill and courage of practiced soldiers; some were engaged in molding bullets, others in loading the guns, while the less robust were engaged in cooking and supplying those in active service with refreshments.

Finally despairing of accomplishing their object, and fearing to remain longer lest their retreat might be cut off by reinforcements from the surrounding country, the savages fired all the houses in the village, killed all the stock which could be found, destroyed all they could lay their hands upon, and retired about daylight, leaving the garrison in possession of the fort and its contents, and deprived of everything outside its walls. As the inhabitants had fled from their homes to the protection of the fort in such great haste, but little had been secured excepting the clothing which covered them, and their distress, after the cessation of hostilities, was consequently great.

Prior to these events, the governor had sent to Col. Andrew Swearingen a quantity of ammunition for the defence of those who remained in the country above Wheeling. Under his superintendence, Bollings and Holladays old forts were repaired, and the latter made strong enough to serve as a magazine, in it was collected all the inhabitants of the neighborhood, which were numerous enough to give it an exceedingly strong garrison. Soon after the attack was commenced on Wheeling, the alarm reached Shepherd's fort, and a runner was dispatched from thence to Holladays fort for volunteers to hurry to the aid of the Wheeling garrison. In response to this call, Col. Swearingen, with fourteen men, got into a large continental canoe, and piled their paddles with energy, hoping to arrive in time to be of service to the beleaguered, the night, however, proved dark and foggy and they were soon obliged to proceed slowly, for fear of passing the point of their destination unwares. The light of the burning village was seen when some distance off, and with all their exertions, they were unable to reach their destination before daylight, when it was impossible for them to reach the fort unseen by the savages.

They were in doubt as to whether the fort had shared the fate of the dwellings, or whether the Indians had withdrawn from the attack, and Col. Swearingen, Capt. Biddleback and William Boshears volunteered to reconnoiter, found their way to the fort, learned the situation, and returned to the river and brought back their companions. Fears being still entertained that the Indians were lying in ambush, a party of twenty started out under Col. Zane for a reconnoissance, who, after a thorough examination, became convinced that the savages were gone, on their return, they were joined by Mrs. McCullough, who had arrived with forty-five men.

Where, but a few hours before, a flourishing village and its surrounding fields of growing grain had stood, a desolate and pitiable sight was presented. Twenty-three of the men who had been attacked the preceding morning were lying dead; the lifeless remains of over three hundred head of live stock were scattered about, and every house, with its contents, was reduced to ashes. The inhabitants went immediately to work, with the characteristic energy of the times, but many months elapsed before they regained the comforts of which they had been so cruelly deprived in a day.

ATTACK ON CAPT. FOREMAN

Soon after the attack upon Fort Wheeling, a company of militia, under the command of Capt. Foreman, arrived from east of the Alleghenies to occupy this stronghold, and afford protection to the surrounding settlements. Parties of Indians were still lurking about, and small detachments of troops were frequently sent out on scouting expedition. September 26, 1777. Capt. Foreman, with forty-five men, proceeded twelve miles below Wheeling, and encamped for the night. He was ignorant of the practices of the Indians, and indisposed to take counsel of those who were conversant with them; contrary to the advice of a soldier named Lynn, who had accompanied him as a spy, he built fires and allowed his men to remain closely around them, while Lynn, with a few frontiersmen who were of the party, retired some distance to spend the night. Before daylight, Lynn heard suspicious sounds on the river above, of which he informed Capt. Foreman in the morning, advising him to return to Wheeling by way of the hillside instead of along the river bottom, his advice was unheeded, but Lynn and four of his companions prudently started to return along the level at the base of the hill.

While marching along the Grave Creek narrow, one of the soldiers found a parcel of Indian ornaments lying beside the path, and, picking them up, soon drew around him the greater part of the company. While thus crowded together, a galling fire was opened upon them by Indians in ambush, which threw them into great confusion, and was continued for some moments; the loss of the whole party would have been the result, had not Lynn and his four comrades rushed from the hillside, discharging their guns and shouting so loudly that the Indians, believing that a large reinforcement was at hand, precipitately retreated. In this disastrous encounter, twenty-one of Capt. Foreman's party (including himself and two men) were slain, and several others severely wounded. It was afterward ascertained that the Indians had dropped these ornaments purposely to attract attention in the narrow defile, while they lay concealed on each side of the path, ready to open a deadly fire at a preconcerted signal. On the ensuing day some of the inhabitants near Wheeling, under the direction of Col. Zane, proceeded to Grave Creek and buried those who had fallen.

SIEGE OF FORT WHEELING

On the first of September 1762, John Lynn (the celebrated spy previously mentioned), being engaged in scouting northward of the Ohio, discovered a large war party of Indians marching rapidly toward Wheeling, and hastening to warn the inhabitants of the danger which threatened them, swam the river and reached the village but a short time before the savage army made its appearance. The fort was without any regular garrison, and the brief space of time which elapsed between the alarm of Lynn and the arrival of the enemy, permitted only those who were present to retire into it, and when the attack was commenced there were only twenty effective men within the palisades to oppose the assault. The dwelling house of Col. Ebenezer Zane, standing about forty yards from the fort, contained the military stores which had been furnished by the governor of Virginia, and as it was admirably situated as an outpost, he resolved to obtain possession of it, in aid in defence of the fort as well as to preserve the ammunition. Andrew Scott, George Green, Mr. Zane, Molly Scott and Miss McCoullough were all who remained with him in the adjoining kitchen were the Colonel's negro slaves, Sam and his wife Kate. Col. Silius Zane commanded at the fort.

The savage army approached, with the British colors waving over them, and, before a shot was fired, a demand was made for the surrender of the garrison. No answer was made to the demand, excepting a few shots, which were directed from the fort, by order of Col. Silius Zane, at the standard which they bore, and the savages rushed to the assault. A well-directed fire from Col. Zane's house and the fort caused them to fall back; again they advanced, and were again repulsed. The admirable arrangements, and the exertions of the women within the fort, rendered the little garrison very effective. The darkness of night was caused a suspension of active hostilities and brought a brief rest to the weary defenders. The assailants had suffered severely from the galling fire which had proceeded from the house, and they determined upon burning it. For this purpose, an Indian crept toward the kitchen, in the darkness, with a concealed firebrand, a shot from the gun of the vigilant Sam sent him howling and hobbling away.

As hostilities were not resumed immediately upon the approach of daylight, it was evident that some new scheme was being concocted. Soon after the firing had ceased the preceding day, a small boat which was loaded with cannon balls, en route from Fort Pitt to the falls of the Ohio, landed at Wheeling, the man who had charge of it, although wounded, escaped into the fort, but the boat and its contents fell into the hands of the enemy. They resolved to use the balls for demolishing the walls of the fortress, and to this end they procured a log with a cavity nearly corresponding to the size of the ball, bound it closely with heavy chains obtained at some of the shops, charged it heavily with powder and ball and pointed it toward the fort. If an Indian ever smiled, it was at this supreme moment; a placid grin, "child-like and bland," was reflected upon each countenance, as the savages witnessed these preparations, and in imagination saw the walls in ruin, and the helpless victims bleeding under the tomahawk and scalping knife. The match was applied, a tremendous explosion shook the earth, the air was filled with splintered pieces of timber and chains, dense smoke and shouts of dismay, the ground was strewn with Indian bodies, some lifeless, many wounded, and more nearly dead with fright. If an Indian was ever astonished, it was at the remarkable result of this artillery practice. Soon recovering from the shock, and furious from disappointment, they pressed to the assault with the blindness of frenzy, but were still repulsed by a fire so constant and deadly that they were again forced to retire at a very opportune time for the garrison.

HEROIC CONDUCT OF ELIZABETH ZANE AND FRANCIS DUFF

When Lynn gave the alarm, those who went into the fort each took with them a supply of ammunition which would have been sufficient but for the long siege and the repeated attacks; there was no other in the fort, as it had not been occupied for a long time. Only a few rounds now remained, and it became necessary to replenish the stock from the magazine in the house of Col. Zane. The danger of this undertaking, in the face of the watchful foe, can be imagined, and yet there were plenty of heroes within the walls who promptly offered to risk their lives in the undertaking.

Among those who thus volunteered, was one who has since had an exalted place in the pages of our country's history and in the hearts of the people as a heroine - Elizabeth, the younger sister of Col. Zane. She was then young, active and athletic, with a spirit to do and dare what duty imposed upon her. She was told that a man would incur less danger, by reason of his greater fleetness, and her reply was, "And, should he fall, his loss will be more severely felt, there is not a man to spare." Her determination was inflexible, and, divesting herself of some of her garments, that her flight might not be impeded, the gate was opened and she bounded forth. The Indians had barely recovered from one surprise, and here was another; no attempt was made to interrupt her progress; they simply gazed, and exclaimed, "White squaw." Arriving at the door, she made known her errand; Col. Zane fastened a table-cloth around her waist, emptied a keg of powder into it, and she again ventured forth. By this time the Indians began to have suspicions, and, as the noble girl sped along, Providence guided her nimble feet and shielded her from the storm of bullets that rained around her; she reached the gate and entered the fort unharmed.

There was also at this time another deed of heroism during that should be perpetuated. When intelligence of the Indian attack upon Wheeling reached Shepherd's fort, a party was immediately dispatched to try to aid in the defense. Upon arriving within view of the scene of action, it was deemed unwise to attempt to gain an entrance into the fort, and the detachment was about to return, when Francis Duke (son-in-law of Col. Shepherd), unwilling to turn his back upon those people in their dire necessity, declared his determination to try and reach the fort and aid the garrison. He was deaf to all persuasions to refrain from what he deemed to be his duty, and, putting spurs to his horse, he galloped rapidly forward, shouting, as he drew near "Open the gate." The inmates heard him, the fastenings of the gate were loosened, the gate was almost reached, when this hero fell, pierced by a score of bullets; surely, this noble man deserved a better fate.

THE SIEGE RAISED—ATTACK ON RICE'S FORT

During that night and all the next day, the Indians maintained the siege, making frequent but unsuccessful attempts to take the fort by storm. On the third night, despairing of success, they tried a ruse, one hundred picked warriors were left to scour and lay waste the country, and the balance retreated across the Ohio, encamping at the Indian spring, five miles from the river. Their loss in killed and wounded had been considerable, some of the garrison were killed, and only two wounded, the hero, Francis Duke was the only white man who fell during the siege.

On the evening preceding the departure of the savages from Wheeling, two white men (who had been among them for a number of years and at this time held command in the army) deserted them, and early the next morning were taken prisoners by the braves. One, at the head of twenty-five men was on his way to aid in the defense of Wheeling fort, (having been taken the intention of the Indians to withdraw from the siege and detach a hundred men to operate in the surrounding country) he dispatched runners in every direction to notify the inhabitants of their danger. The place against which the savages directed their operations was located on Buffalo creek, twelve or fifteen miles from its entrance into the Ohio, and known as Rice's fort. When the alarm first reached them, there were only five men to defend the fort, the balance having gone to Hagerstown to exchange peltries for ammunition, salt and iron; these five were afterward joined by Jacob Miller. On the approach of the Indians, the cabins were deserted, and the inhabitants repaired to the block-house, where every possible preparation had been made for defence. The Indians finding that they had been discovered, rushed up to take the fort by storm, but were met by the fire of six brave and expert riflemen, each of whose shots reached its mark, and they retired to the protection of the surrounding trees. A desultory firing was kept up until night, with no damage to the whites, but an Indian would receive a ball whenever any portion of his body came within range. The shots of the latter were directed principally against the stock as they came up to the station in the evening, and the ground was strewn with dead carcasses. About ten o'clock they fired a large bomb (about thirty yards from the block-house), filled with grain and hay, and by its light kept up the assault until two o'clock, when they departed.

Their loss was four killed, and many wounded. George Finkenauer was the only white who suffered; a stray shot which entered through a partition struck him in the forehead, and he instantly expired. The surviving defenders of the fort were Jacob Miller, George Leffler, Peter Finkenwender, Daniel Rice and Jacob Leffler, Jr.

ADAM POPE'S BATTLE

It was during the summer of this year (1782), that a party of seven Wyandot warriors (five of whom were the most distinguished chief of that nation and his four brothers) came into view of the intermediate settlements between Fort Pitt and Wheeling, killed an old man, robbed his cabin, and commenced retreating with their plunder. They were discovered by spies, and eight men (two of whom were Adam and Andrew Poe, brothers, celebrated for their great stature, strength, activity and courage), went in pursuit of them. Coming onto their trail near the Ohio, Adam Poe, fearing an ambuscade, left his companions to follow it, while he moved across to the shore under cover of the high weeds and bushes. As he approached the Ohio, he espied an Indian raft near the water's edge; moving cautiously down, he discovered the large Wyandot chief and a smaller Indian intently watching the party of whites, who were then some distance lower down the bottom. Poe raised his gun and took accurate aim at the chief, but the piece failed to discharge, and the snap of the trigger betrayed his presence. Springing forward, he seized the large Indian, and at the same time encircling his arm around the neck of the smaller one, threw them both to the ground. Extricating himself from the grasp of Poe, the small savage raised his tomahawk, but as he aimed the blow, a vigorous kick staggered him back and caused him to let his weapon fall. Recovering quickly, he aimed several blows at Poe, who was held as the arms of the chief, but the vigilance and activity of the backwoodsman enabled him to evade them, although he received a severe wound in his wrist, while engaged in wading them off. By a violent effort, he freed himself from the grasp of the chief, and hastily seizing a gun, shot the smaller Indian through the heart.

The chief had regained his feet, and grasping Poe, a terrible hand-to-hand encounter ensued. Having been taken at a disadvantage, Poe was thrown to the ground, but actively opposing his fall, the two muscular antagonists closed in a deadly embrace, both falling into the water, after a severe struggle. The nature of the contest was now changed, and each endeavored to drown his opponent with alternate success, first one and then the other being under water. At length, securing a hold on the long tuft of hair upon the head of the chief, Poe succeeded in holding him under water until he supposed him dead; but releasing his hold too soon, the gigantic savage was again on his feet, ready to renew the contest. Grappling each other again, they were carried beyond their depth and obliged to swim. Both sought the shore, each straining every nerve to reach it first that he might end the conflict with one of the guns lying upon the beach. Observing that the Indian gained upon him, Poe turned and swam out into the river and tried to avoid being shot by diving. Fortunately his antagonist had hold of the gun which had already been discharged by Poe when he had killed the smaller Indian, and he was enabled to get some distance into the river.

In the meantime, the whites had encountered the other five Indians, and after a desperate conflict succeeded in killing all but one, with the loss of three of their own number. Andrew Poe was one who escaped, and he hastened to the aid of his brother. Two of the whites, coming upon the scene as Adam was swimming from the shore, mistook him for an escaping Indian and fired upon him, wounding him in the shoulder. At this juncture, Andrew appeared, and his brother swam for the shore shouting, "Shoot the big Indian." This was quickly done by Andrew, who then plunged into the river to assist Adam to the shore. The chief, having received his death wound, rolled himself into the water, in order to cheat his antagonist out of his scalp and sunk, to rise no more.

DOMESTIC MANUFACTURES AND "STYLES," 1790 TO 1810

Manufactured cloth was almost unavailable here in an early day, and it devolved upon the settlers to use their wits and depend upon themselves for material with which they could become comfortably clothed. The favorite and almost universal material of a hunter's or ranger's suit was deer skin, as it was best prepared to stand the rough usage to which it was subjected, and many families, from the oldest to the youngest, were thus clad. A suit made of it would last a long time, and the young ladies were not obliged to change the cut and style of their dresses every fall and spring. Great skill was attained in making the deer skin soft and pliable as the finest cloth. The settlers who came from New England were nearly all adepts at manufacturing cloth of different materials, bringing with them their spinning wheels and looms. One of the finest accomplishments of a young lady was to become skilled in the use of these. It was a pleasant recreation for them, while in the block houses, to congregate together in the evening and run them, and frequent bouts in speed and skill were had.

Hemp and flax were raised in small quantities, and for a few years cotton was raised to some extent and manufactured into stockings, or mixed with hemp and flax, for cloth. The rich soil of the bottom lands was well adapted to the cultivation of cotton, and for a time it was successful, but it was soon found that the season was too short for it, the early frost destroying it before maturity, and the attempt was abandoned. Dr. Spencer, of Vienna, Wood county, about the year 1800, raised cotton in his garden, the stems of which were eight or ten feet high, and produced forty pounds of long, fine cotton, in the seed, on three square rods of ground. A colored woman, who had been familiar with its culture in the South, planted it early in April. Cotton, at this time, was just coming into cultivation, as a staple, in the South, and, worth from forty to fifty cents per pound. Silk worms were raised, and cocoons reeled and spun into strong sewing thread, at Marietta, as early as 1800. Sheep were not introduced until after peace was established with the Indians, about 1797, and they then came from Pennsylvania. Then nearly every farmer had his flock of sheep and his patch of flax. The wool was carded with hand-cards, spun and woven at home, and made up into garments for both sexes. The older people can remember what nice suits were made for men of "totted cloth," and what fine gowns for women of "pressed flannel." The flax was pulled and spread out in rows on the ground, "rotted," and then "broken and scurged," and was thus prepared for spinning on the "little wheel," as the machine was called on which the flax was spun, to distinguish it from the larger machine for spinning wool. It was woven into cloth for table-covers, toweling, sheeting and shirting. The "tow," which was the coarse portion combed out of the hutchet, was spun into coarse yarn of which a cloth was made for summer suits for men and boys. The tow shirt, so commonly worn, was, when new, an instrument of torture to the wearer, as it was full of prickly spines left from the wooly parts of the stalk.

Nearly all the cloth worn in the families of the settlers, for over twenty years, for every-day dresses, was made at home by the wives and daughters. Procuring material for clothing, therefore, was the least of their troubles. A neat deerskin or homespun dress, and close-fitting moccasins, made a rustic and pretty costume, and, enveloping a rosy-cheeked, bright-eyed maiden, they presented a handsome picture. At least, so thought the young huntsman, in his picturesque suit of the same material, whom the young lady no doubt admired more than if he were attired in the richest broadcloth.

THE FIRST "GRIST MILL"

Owing to the constant danger of Indian attacks in the interior, where excellent water-power might have been obtained for the running of the machinery of a grist-mill, no one dared to take the risk of constructing one, for a number of years after the first settlements were made, and each family was obliged to purchase their own grain by the best means at hand. Before the corn had become hardened, it was a common custom to take it while on the cob and scrape it on a grater made of a piece of tin, punched full of holes, using the rough side. After the grain had become too hard to scrape in this way, the wheat or sorghum was either ground in a corn mill, by those who were fortunate enough to have one, or pounded with the use of mortar and pestle. The sweep was sometimes used for pounding grain into meal. This was a pole of some spruce, elastic wood, thirty feet long or more; the butt end was placed under the side of the house or a large stump. This pole was supported by two knots, placed about one-third of its length from the butt end, so as to elevate the small end about fifteen feet from the ground; to this was attached, by a large mortise, a piece of a sapling, about five or six inches in diameter, and eight or ten feet long. The lower end of this was shaped so as to answer for a pestle. A wooden pin was put through it at a proper height, so that two persons could work at the sweep at once. The mortar for holding the grain was made of a large block of wood, about three feet long, with an excavation hewn in one end, wide at the top and narrow at the bottom, so that the action of the pestle on the bottom threw the corn up the sides toward the top, from whence it continually fell into the mass. After being pounded as fine as possible, the meal would be sifted into a hand-sieve, generally made of deer skins, in the form of parquiment, stretched over a hoop, and perforated with a hot wire. The first water-mills were of the kind known as tub-mills, the machinery of which was nearly all alike, very simple and inexpensive. It consisted of an upright shaft, to the lower end of which a horizontal wheel, of four or five feet in diameter, was attached. The upper end passed through the ceiling and carried the millstone. The bolting cloth was used, but the sitters, above described, furnished the flour in a manner that, a short days, was highly satisfactory. The most patent rollers process cannot be compared with it. In the summer of 1791, a novel mill was constructed by Griffin Green and Capt. Jonathan Devoll, of Farmers Castle (below Bellevue, on the Ohio river), which cost fifty-one pounds eight shillings, and was of the following description. Two boats were built, one five and the other ten feet wide, and both forty-five feet long. The larger was made of plank, similar to a flatboat, and the other of the trunk of a large sycamore tree. They were placed about twelve feet apart, parallel to each other, and between them was constructed a paddle-wheel, very similar to the stern wheels used on many river boats, which rested in the water to the depth of the paddles. The boats were connected by platforms built of planks on each side of the wheel. On each boat rested an end of the water-wheel shaft, and on the larger was erected a frame building sufficiently large to contain the gearing and one run of small stone, and containing storage for a small amount of grain and meal. The establishment was held to its place by a cable chain fastened to a firm anchor. The wheel could thus be run by action of the current, and a place was selected where the position was safe from Indian attack, and the current was sufficiently strong. By a simple contrivance, the mill could be started and stopped, and would grind from two to four bushels per hour, according to the strength of the current. When any wheat was obtained to be ground, it went through a bolting reel in the garner, turned by hand. This river mill was visited by all the settlers on both sides of the Ohio and its tributaries, in canoes, for a distance of twenty miles or more, and it was so much of an improvement over the old style, that the quality of the work and size of the toll-dish was never an object of criticism. Happy miller!

EARLY SCHOOLS

The school-houses first erected for the accommodation of pupils who, at an early day, sought the limited education that was then obtainable, were nearly all alike. The house was generally built in the woods, of round logs, in size 16 by 18 or 20 feet, with a punchon floor, and walls chunked and daubed with clay. A fire-place entirely occupied one end of the building, and for light a space was left unfilled between the logs, on three sides of the building, at a proper height, covered over with paper greased with hog's lard, to make it semi-transparent; glass was too much of a luxury to be well afforded. Seats were made by splitting logs of the desired length, cut from small trees, smoothing the inner side, with logs inserted in the under or round side. The writing desks were made by boring holes in the logs, under the paper windows, inserting long pins therein, upon which boards were laid and fastened. The fuel was of great, green logs, chopped in the surrounding forest by the larger scholars, and rolled into the house in the evening ready for morning. The fire was always large and cheerful the pleasantest feature of the school-room. A male teacher was generally employed; and one of the pupils, who has been there, has the following fond recollection of him: The teacher's equipage was a gad about six feet long, a big rule and a dunce block - these for the scholar; a pint bottle of whiskey in the coat pocket - this for the teacher. These combined, made a lively school. It is doubtful if the young generation fully appreciate the advantages they now have (in the good, commodious school-houses, comfortably furnished, and in the well-trained teachers) over their fathers and grandfathers, who had to travel through sleet and snow, sometimes three or four miles, to receive the first rudiments of an education.

PRICES CURRENT IN 1778-79

The following is a partial price-list of provisions, stock, etc., in western Virginia in 1778. Cattle, ten pounds, or thirty-three and one-third dollars per head; horses, twenty-five pounds, or eighty-three dollars and twenty-five cents; flour, fifty shillings per barrel, equal to sixteen dollars, or six pence per pound; a common woodman's ax, thirty shillings, or five dollars; a pack-saddle, about the same, salt, six pounds, or twenty dollars per bushel. The latter article was then brought from the sea-coast, and imported, none of any consequence being made in the country. Provisions at this time were exceedingly scarce and dear, and these prices are not estimated in a depreciated currency, but in silver dollars or their equivalent in those days, when salt works are so numerous in this State, and the finest quality is so cheap, it is difficult to believe that any such price was paid here; but it is, nevertheless, a fact. In January, 1779, provisions became very scarce and dear, west of the mountains. The employing of many men in the public service required a large supply, and the main portion of it was brought from the eastern side of the mountains on pack-horses. During the winter months, when the roads were at the worst, and the service was attended with great danger from Indian attacks, curren demanded and received twenty pounds per hundred weight for the transport of flour and other provisions from Cumberland to Pittsburgh, and then there was added additional cost of transportation down the river. At Pittsburgh, bacon was seven and six pence a pound, or one dollar in Pennsylvania money. The price of salt rose to sixteen pounds per bushel; the same being eight dollars per bushel near the sea-coast, in Maryland. Wheat rose to six dollars per bushel, and in a letter of Col. Morgan to Benjamin Kirkendall, a miller, on Peter's Creek, he says he was forwarded three thousand dollars to purchase five hundred bushels at that rate; this was doubtless the actual price in paper money, as it was estimated at from forty to forty-five shillings - "Pennsylvania currency."

BACKWOODSMEN AND RANGERS

When settlements were first made in western Virginia, nearly every man was a gamester, woodman, and more or less an adept in hunting game and in the art, they became teachers, and the necessities of the times soon developed the pupil into a master. The vigilance of the rangers employed as safeguards to the pioneer settler, and the skill of the settler in the use of the rifle soon became known to the wily Indians, which deterred them from committing nearly a depredation that they longed to indulge in. Although revenge was used with them, and then cruel attacks enjoyed the scenes of savage butchery which were frequently resorted to, yet, unless unusually injured by some recent act of the whites, or by the eloquence of some noted chief, they would seldom risk their lives deliberately, for the sole purpose of gratifying it. The hope of plunder was the main stimulus with them, hence they sought it where the most could be obtained with the least risk to themselves. Periodically for the white people, the plan of preparation for a general war - the collecting of the means of subsistence for a large body of men, and the proper provision for those left at home - could not be carried out by them; they were therefore obliged to proceed in small parties which could generally be successfully resisted, and which seldom hung about a neighborhood for more than a week, while larger bodies could not keep together for want of food. Judge Barker estimates that, in the seven years previous to the war of 1791, the Indians killed and took prisoners 1,500 persons, and stole 2,500 horses, besides property to the amount of $30,000 in the Ohio valley.

FAIRM LIFE

Western Virginia was very thinly settled and a comparatively recent date. For various reasons, notwithstanding the rich resources of the country, and the mode of life among the people was very primitive. The chief amount of gain that was made was fed to stock, which was driven to the settlements to be sold. Corn, the chief product, if it found any market at all, brought less than twenty-five cents per bushel, oats, twelve and one-half cents, beef, pork and venison, two to two and one-half dollars per hundred weight, and other articles in proportion, mostly or entirely payable in store goods, at an enormous profit. But, notwithstanding this fact, the inhabitants of this hilly section were perfectly independent, and generally lived a life of the keenest enjoyment, after the troubles with the Indians had ceased. It is doubtful if any people in the world had less ease or took more solid comfort in life. Many a young man married the girl of his choice, and, with his ax on one shoulder and his rifle on the other, with little of this world's goods to cause him trouble, and, accompanied by his faithful companion, located where he had purchased at small cost, upon rich bottom land, beside some stream, with the high hills in the back ground. Here he cleared away the forest, built a comfortable cabin, cultivated his crops, which he fed mostly to his stock, and raised a family of children. His main recreation was the hunting of wild game, which abounded among the hills, the skins of the bear, deer and other animals finding a ready market. This was varied by angling in the mountain streams, where fish of a fine quality were plenty. Breathing the pure mountain air, with regular and simple habits, very little sickness was experienced among them, except what was successfully treated by the matron of the household with her preparation of herbs. Their clothing was made of homespun, and their shoes were home-made moccasins. The women were generally rosy-checked and pretty, and the men, well-formed specimens of manhood. As an almost universal rule, the Christian religion was observed in these families, and strictest Methodist and Baptist ministers held frequent services in every neighborhood. It is doubtful whether the young men of today, marrying and starting out in life, surrounded though he may be with every luxury that wealth can purchase, can possibly experience so pure and joyful an existence. It can only be counterbalanced by the present superior facilities for education, and that keener sense of all that is beautiful and good that a higher order of intelligence and cultivation gives.

SKETCHES OF EARLY PIONEERS LEWIS WETZEL

The subject of this sketch was one of the most noted of that band of brave and skillful rangers which rendered such invaluable service to the pioneers of western Virginia and Ohio. Much has been published concerning him which illustrates his courage, prowess, and unselfish devotion to the welfare of his companions. He was but a lad when his father, John Wetzel, removed with his family, from South Branch and settled in the neighborhood of Wheeling, in company with the Zanes, Shepherds, McCulloughs, and others, in 1770, when that country was an uninhabited wilderness.

It was not until the summer of 1774 that the boy first gave promise of that remarkable, daring and discretion which became so fully developed in his maturer years. When about fourteen years old, he and his brother Jacob (still younger) were discovered some distance from the house by a party of Indians, who had been prowling among the settlements on the Ohio river in search of plunder and scalps. As the boys were in an opening, some distance from them, the Indians determined to shoot the larger one, but his greater activity might enable him to escape. A shot was accordingly discharged at him, which carried away a part of his breast bone, and temporarily disabled him, so that he was easily made prisoner with his little brother. The Indians immediately directed their steps toward their towns, and having traveled about twenty miles beyond the Ohio river, encamped at the big rock on the waters of St. Marys creek on the second night of the boys' captivity.

When the Indians had finished eating, they laid down without confining the boys, as on the previous evening, and soon fell asleep. After making a little movement to test the soundness of their repose, Lewis whispered to his little brother that he must get up and go home with him, and, after some hesitation on the part of Jacob, they arose and started off. When they had proceeded about a hundred yards, Lewis bade his brother remain there, and he returned to camp and secured a pair of moccasins for each of them; he returned the second time, and captured his father's gun and some ammunition and then these two "babes in the woods" commenced their journey home.

They followed the back trail by the light of the moon, but had not proceeded far before they heard the Indians coming in pursuit of them. Waiting until they had approached very near, Lewis drew his brother into concealment behind some bushes until they had passed, when the boys followed on in the rear of the Indians. Lewis was exceedingly watchful, and when the latter returned, after their fruitless search, he again concealed himself with his brother and escaped observation. They were then hunted by two savages on horseback, but by pursuing the same stratagem they evaded them also, and on the next day reached the Ohio river, opposite Wheeling. Fearing that he might attract the attention of some Indian who might be following, Lewis refrained from hallooing, but expeditiously constructed a raft, on which they crossed the river in safety, and soon found their way home.

Among those of the troops who went out to fight the Indians under Col. Crawford, in the spring of 1782, was a man named Mills, who, after the defeat, escaped into Wheeling. Having exhausted his horse by continued rapid driving, he had been obliged to leave him near the present town of St. Clairsville, Ohio, and wishing to secure him, after his arrival at Wheeling, he prevailed upon Lewis Wetzel to aid in searching for him. The latter advised him to prepare for fighting.

the American people that he will live forever in their hearts. He served with Washington on the frontiers of Virginia, in fort and field; was with the ill-fated Braddock expedition to Fort Duquesne, and took the most prominent part in the history of the early settlement of Kentucky. When Lord Dunmore organized his Savanah campaign, in 1774, Boone was placed in command of three garrisons.

He accompanied Capts. Shelby, Russell and others, to join Gen. Lewis at Fort Union, in the Greenbrier levels. The three forts of which he had command were probably these: Fort Union, Morris fort (at the mouth of Kellys creek, nineteen miles from Charleston - the upper fort of the valley), and Clendenans fort, Charleston.

The eventful years of Boone's life in Kentucky followed, and when his distinguished services in the settlement of that country had been rewarded with ingratitude and forgetfulness, he turned his steps again to the Virginia that had better appreciated his worth. He had penetrated the wilderness when no other white man trod its soil. He had discovered its wonderful resources and proclaimed them to the world. His footsteps had been marked with blood. Two darling sons had fallen by savage hands amid the gloomy defiles of the Allegheny mountains. Many dark and sleepless nights had he been the companion of wild beasts, and among bloody-throated savages; separated from the society of civilized men, scorched by the summer's sun and chilled by the winter's cold - an instrument ordained to settle the wilderness. When the cloud of Indian warfare had passed away, and Boone had settled upon his lands, there, as he supposed, to spend the evening of his eventful life in quiet and peace, his title to his lands was disputed, and legal proceedings commenced against him. Boone could not comprehend this. He had led the way there; he had established himself and family in the land, and had defended it from the incursions of the Indians. And now, his lands were taken from him in his declining years, and he was driven from his farm, robbed of every acre, a houseless, homeless, impoverished man.

At the age of fifty-five years he returned with his family to Virginia, making his residence in Mason county, at Point Pleasant, which settlement was then made up of the fort and a few log cabins. Soon afterward he removed to the south side of the Kanawha, four miles from the present city of Charleston, and half a mile from the noted hot spring, just opposite the present Daniel Boone and Snow Hill salt furnaces. His house was a double log one, with a passage between and a porch in front, all under one roof. In 1791, he was elected, with George Clendenin, to represent Kanawha county in the legislature. In the first military organization of the county, October 6, 1789, Thomas Lewis was appointed colonel, and Daniel Boone lieutenant-colonel.

During Boone's ten or twelve years' residence in the Kanawha valley, his time was principally occupied in hunting and trapping for beaver, and an occasional adventure with the Indians. Among his companions in trapping and hunting expeditions were Col. Robert Stafford and James Burford (in what is now Galia county, Ohio), John Warth, sr., Van Botten and many others, who, in after years, delighted in relating anecdotes of the old hero. Much of Boone's time was also occupied in locating and surveying lands, his thorough knowledge of the geography and topography of the whole country rendering his services in this line particularly valuable.

One of the pioneers of the valley was John Finn, who settled on Cabin creek, fifteen miles above Charleston. During an Indian raid in the valley, Finn and his wife were killed, their cabin burned, and their daughter (Coe taken prisoner. Boone's only daughter, being away from the house at the time, escaped through the wilderness to Fort Donnelly, in Greenbrier county, being notified, immediately organized a party and led them in pursuit of the savages, down the valley. The latter were overtaken and killed, and Chie rescued; the little orphan was made a member of Boone's family, and brought up and educated as a daughter.

In the fall of 1798, Daniel Boone left the Kanawha valley for Missouri, much to the regret of the whole community, who gathered from far and near, in canoes, on horseback and on foot, to bid him God-speed and a final adieu. He left by water, with the main part of his family and worldly goods, in canoes, embarking from the mouth of the Elk and Kanawha rivers, and thus wet the cheeks of his sturdy companions of the hunting-ground and battle-field, as they watched him floating down the river, and faintly heard his cheery last farewell, as it was borne upon the breeze.

This was the fourth great move of his life. Born on the banks of the Delaware, his childhood was passed amid the solitudes of the Upper Schuylkill, his early manhood, where he reared his cabin and took to it his worthy bride, was in North Carolina, thence penetrating the wilderness, through adventures surpassing the dreams of romance, he had passed many years amidst the most wonderful vicissitudes of quietude and of agitation, of peace and of war, at Boonesborough, in the valley of the Kentucky river. And now he forever bade adieu to his native country, and left Point Pleasant to find another Kentucky within the dominions of the crown of Spain. He reached the Mississippi safely, crossed the river into what is now the State of Missouri, and found a happy greeting in the cabin of his son, Daniel M. Boone, who had established himself on the west banks of the river, near where the city of St. Louis now stands. Don Carlos, the Spanish governor, gave Boone 5,000 acres of land on the north side of the Missouri river, from which he was allowed to make good the claims of those to whom he had sold land in Kentucky.

He will now follow him through all the vicissitudes through which he passed toward the Father of Waters, but it is not, that here he continued to reside until the year 1820, when Col. Daniel Boone, in the eighty-sixth year of his age, passed from among the living. His remains were brought to Frankfort, Kentucky in 1845, where they were re-interred amid the most imposing ceremonies.

ANN BAILEY

For generations the traditional history of this remarkable person has been transmitted from father to son, and from mother to daughter, and today a traveler could scarcely call at the house of a family in the Great Kanawha valley, at which he could not hear some adventure recounted, or anecdote related illustrative of the character of this remarkable woman. Many localities in the valley, or along the old war trail from Fort Union to Point Pleasant, are rendered famous as the spots upon, or near which, some of her exploits are said to have occurred, as the mouth of Elk river, where she set upon the back of her horse, "Liverpool," and shot a "howl on a beam tree across the mouth of Elk river."

Her maiden name was Hennis. She was born at Liverpool, England, and at the age of thirty married Richard Trotter, with whom she sought a home in the Province of Virginia, then an English colony, tributary to the crown of Great Britain, because of their extreme poverty, both were "sold out," as was then the custom, to defray the expenses of their passage. They were bought by a gentleman residing in Augusta county, Virginia, where, after their term of service expired, they became settlers. In 1774 Mr. Trotter enlisted in Col. Charles Lewis' regiment, and fell with him on the bloody field at Point Pleasant.

From the moment that the widow heard of her husband's death, a strange wild dream seemed to possess her. She expressed the strongest hatred of the Indian race, and declared her intention to seek revenge. She at once abandoned the natural pursuits of woman, and, arming herself with a rifle and somewhat, rode about the country attending every matter of the soldiers, while, attired in hunting-shirt, leggings and moccasins, she commanded universal attention. About the year 1777, she married a man named Bailey, and shortly after accompanied him to Clendenens fort, on the site of the present city of Charleston, in which her husband had been assigned to garrison duty. Here she soon became celebrated for her skill with the rifle, and at once entered upon a career as spy and messenger, which won for her the title of "The Semiramis of America." Her field of operations lay between Point Pleasant and the distant settlements on the James and Potomac. Over lofty mountains and through rugged canons she rode, mounted upon her favorite horse, "Liverpool," named in commemoration of her birth-place in England. Of the many adventures related, we select the following: When upon one of her journeys from Point Pleasant to Clendenens fort, she was discovered by a band of Indians, who raised a whoop and started in hot pursuit. In order to elude them, she dismounted from her horse and crept into a large hollow sycamore log. The savages came up, and after resting upon the log in which she was concealed, took possession of "Liverpool" and led him away. Soon after our heroine crept from her place of concealment and followed on the trail until late at night, when she came upon the party fast asleep, with the horse tied near by. She crept forward, untied him, mounted upon his back, and after giving a shout of defiance, bounded away, and in course of time reached Clendenens fort in perfect safety.

Soon after the murder of Cornstalk, at Point Pleasant, the commander of the fort at Charleston received, through his scouts, intelligence of the approach of a large band of Indians. An examination of the stock of supplies in the garrison, it was found that the supply of powder was nearly exhausted. To obtain a supply, a journey of many miles, through a trackless wilderness, infested by evil-doing savages, had to be made, and not a man within the fort would consent to start upon the hazardous undertaking. But no sooner did the facts become known to Mrs. Bailey, than she fitted herself out in appropriate style, and mounting her faithful "Liverpool," rode away into the wilderness, upon her perilous undertaking. Day and night she continued her course, often seen by the Indians, but as frequently eluding them, until 140 miles had been passed, and she arrived before the walls of Fort Union, into which she was soon ushered, here she made known her errand to the commander, who furnished her an extra horse, and causing both to be heavily laden with the munitions of war, offered to send a detachment with her. This she refused, and at once set out, all alone, on her return. Two days and nights after, she reached Clendenens, and turned over to the commander her consignment of supplies. The next morning the fort was furiously assailed by the savages, but the garrison, now having a sufficient supply of powder, withstood the shock, and repulsed the savages. Thus, to Ann Bailey was Capt. Clendenens and his garrison indebted for their safety and the defeat of their relentless foe.

After the storm of war had passed away she still retained her singular habits and spent much of her time in fishing and hunting. She received the name of "Mad Ann Bailey," on account of her eccentricities, which were regarded with great indulgence by the people. "Mad Ann" and "Liverpool" were known far and wide, and wherever they went were greeted with gifts and smiles of welcome.

Her son, William Trotter, settled in what is now Hamilton township, Gallia county, Ohio. Here his mother accompanied him, and resided for nearly twenty-three years. She enjoyed solitude, but the neighbors occasionally would induce her to relate some of her daring adventures. She died in 1825, and then to be in the 120th year of her age, and her remains were buried on a hill overlooking her son's residence. Virginia and Ohio should build a monument of enduring mark upon the spot.

Hardesty's POCAHONTAS COUNTY

GEOGRAPHY OF POCAHONTAS COUNTY.

Pocahontas county lies in the extreme eastern portion of the State, and is the southernmost of what is known as the mountain tier of counties. It is bounded on the north by Randolph county; northeast, by Pendleton; east and southeast, by Highland and Bath counties, in Old Virginia; south, by Greenbrier, and west by Greenbrier and Webster. The thirty-eighth parallel of north latitude bisects the second meridian west from Washington at a point near the center of the county, while Huntersville, the county-seat, is north 38deg. 24sec., and west 3deg. and 4min.

The surface is for the most part rough and mountainous. It is here that the traveler beholds lofty longitudinal and transverse ranges, trending to every point of the compass, and as he stands and gazes upon the scene spread out before him, he experiences that feeling of sublimity which ever impresses the traveler when the picture of scenic grandeur spread out before him, and the mind soars away and dwells upon Him whose power reared those mighty masses around him, and realises that He who did it "caused a thousand worlds to be."

Here is the culminating point of the Alleghany range; Mount Rayard, four miles west of Hillsboro, and formerly called Briery Knob, is the highest point in the range, and its summit is the highest land in West Virginia. Along the eastern boundary stretch the Alleghenies proper, in the north are the Rich mountains, Cheat mountains Middle mountains; in the west are the Yew mountains and Black Range, while in the south are the Seater mountains, Cranberry Range, and Knob mountains, the highest point of the latter being Droop mountain, now historical because of the fierce battle fought upon it and around its northern base during the late war. In the center lie the Brown mountains and Buckley peaks.

Immense masses of iron ore abound in all parts of the county, these near Huntersville being of such an extent as to far outstrip the far-famed Iron Mountain and Pilot Knob of Missouri.

When this region shall have railroad connection with the commercial centers, there will it become a great iron producing region, and deposits of excellent ore will be developed, which ages of the most active industry cannot exhaust.

The Greenbrier river has its source in the extreme northern part, and flows southwest, dividing the county into two nearly equal parts. It is one of the most beautiful rivers which flow out from the Alleghenies. On the eastern side its principal tributaries are: Deer creek, Thony creek, Knapps creek, Beaver creek and Laurel creek. Cocharon creek and Donthards creek, both named from early settlers upon their banks, are tributaries of Knapps creek. But few small streams flow in from the west. Leatherwood, Stony, and Stamping creeks—the latter so called from the fact that vast herds of buffaloes formerly resorted thither—are the principal ones. In the west are several small streams forming the headwaters of Gauley and Elk rivers. Among those falling into the former are Cranberry river, North fork of Williams river, Mountain run, Beaver Dam creek, Days run (so called from an old pioneer), Laurel creek and Tea creek, the latter taking its name from the peculiar color of its waters. Of those flowing into the ER, Burgoon and Spring creeks are the most prominent.

FORMATION OF THE COUNTY.

It was in the month of March, in the year 1821, that the general assembly of Virginia passed a bill entitled "An act to provide for the formation of a new county out of parts of Bath, Pendleton and Randolph." Section first of this bill defined the boundaries of the new county, the area of which was 760 square miles. In 1824 the southern boundary line was changed, and 60 square miles was taken from Greenbrier, thus increasing the area to 820 miles, its present area. The same section also declared that the new county should be styled and known as Pocahontas, in memory of, and in honor of the Indian princess of that name. Another section named the place and fixed the time at which the first court should be held.

THE FIRST COUNTY COURT.

In conformity with the before-mentioned act, the first county court ever held for Pocahontas county, convened at the house of John Bradshaw on the 5th day of March, 1822, the day appointed for that purpose. The following justices of the peace, each holding commissions signed by his excellency, Thomas Mann Randolph, Governor of the commonwealth, namely John Jordan, William Poag, jr., James Tollman, Robert Gray, George Poag, Benjamin Tollman, John Baxter and George Burner. John Baxter qualified the court, each member of which took the oath of office, the oath of fidelity to the commonwealth, the oath to support the constitution of the United States, and the oath against dueling. William Poag then in turn administered the several oaths to John Baxter, and the court was declared open for the transaction of such business as might properly come before it.

John Jordan then presented a commission from the governor appointing him high sheriff of the county, after which he gave bond in the penalty of $30,000, with Abraham McNeel and Isaac McNeel as his bondsmen, and took the several oaths prescribed by law. Josiah Beard was then appointed clerk of the court, and with Thomas Beard, George Poag and James Tollman entered into a bond of $3,000, took the oaths, and at once entered upon the discharge of his duties, and how well he performed the work let any one answer who has examined the early records of Pocahontas county. John Reynolds was then appointed attorney from the commonwealth. He at once took the oath, and began to look after the interests of the Old Dominion. Then Sampson L. Mathews was recommended "as a fit and proper person to execute the office of surveyor of lands." William Hughes was then appointed constable for the lower district on the Little Level, it being the same barwick in which the said William Hughes had served when it was a portion of Bath county. He gave bond in the penalty of $500, with William McNeel and Robert McClintock as his securities. Then James Cooper was appointed constable of Pocahontas county, in the district called the "Head of Greenbrier," whereupon he and his bondsmen, William Stevens and Samuel Hogart, entered into a bond of $500, conditioned as the law directs, Cyrus Cury and Johnston Reynolds having obtained license to practice law in the inferior and superior courts of the commonwealth, were, upon their motion permitted to practice law as counsel or attorneys in the courts of this county. On motion the court then adjourned until 10 A.M. the next day.

March 6th the court convened as per adjournment, all the justices present except Robert Gray, John Jordan who the day before had qualified as high sheriff, came into court and asked that his son Jonathan be appointed as his deputy, and the record says: "The court being of the opinion that the said Jonathan Jordan is a man of honesty, probity and good demeanor, and he is therefore permitted to qualify; whereupon he took the several oaths." The court then proceeded to appoint overseers or surveyors of the various roads, completed and prospective, within the county; and the names of those who thus assumed charge of the highways and thoroughfares through the mountains of what but a few years before had been the wilds of West Augusta, were as follows: James Collison, William Edmiston, John Hill, John Cochran, Alexander Wadell, John McNeel (little John), Robert Moore, Martin Dille, Benjamin Arbogast, William Sharp, William Hartman, and Joseph Wolfenbarger. Robert Gay was then appointed commissioner of the revenue, whereupon he came into court, and with William Cackley and John Baxter entered into a bond in the penalty of $1,000, after which he took the several oaths required by law.

The court then proceeded to organize the county militia, as a part of the military establishment of the State. The following named persons were named as "fit and proper" to fill the respective offices, and the governor and council requested to appoint the same: John Baxter for colonel; commandant of the county of Pocahontas, Benjamin Tollman for the office of lieutenant colonel, William Blair for major, Isaac Tollman, William Arbogast, Henry Harold, Isaac

Moore, and Milburn Hughes, captains; Andrew G. Mathews, Robert Warwick, William Morgan, William Young, and James Rhea, for lieutenants; Jacob Stevens, James Wankles, Samuel Young, and James Callison, for ensigns.

Then Abraham McNeel was recommended to the governor as a suitable person to discharge the office of coroner for the county. A license was then granted to Travis W. Perkins to keep a house of entertainment, who thus became the first hotel proprietor in Pocahontas county. Then Jacob W. Mathews, Thomas Hill, John Stevens, James Callison, William Edmiston, John Gilliland, William Cackley, Samuel Cummings, John Bradshaw, Joseph Moore, Patrick Butler, James Waugh and James Sharp were each recommended as suitable persons to be appointed justices of peace, and the court having put both the civil and military machinery in complete running order, adjourned, and Pocahontas county entered upon her career as one of the integral factors of the "Old Dominion."

MAY TERM OF 1822

This term convened at the house of John Bradshaw on the 7th day of the month, and the first grand jury that ever sat for the body of Pocahontas county was empaneled and sworn. It was composed of the following named persons: Samuel Dougherty, foreman; John Mooney, George Key, John Johnston, Joseph Freed, James Grimes, James Bridger, Samuel Waugh, Henry Harold, James Lewis, John Grimes, Morris Hughes, William Blair, Andrew Edmiston, Samuel Hogart, James McNeel, William McNeel, John Moore, Lanty Lockridge, Jonathan Griffin, and Abraham Seaboard. After receiving their instructions they retired "to consider of their presentments," and after they returned into court, having found two indictments, one against David H. Smith for assault and battery, and another against Josiah Bean for obstructing the public highway.

SHE FOR WHOM THE COUNTY WAS NAMED

Pocahontas, king of the confederated tribes of Atlantic Virginia. Her real name was Matocha, but this was carefully concealed from the English because of a superstition prevailing among the Indians to the effect that no harm could befall one whose true name was unknown. She was born about the year 1595, and early in life gave the strongest evidence of her friendship for the English. Every one is familiar with the story of the rescue of Captain John Smith, and also of the frustration of the plot to cut off the colonists in 1609, information of which was conveyed to Jamestown by Pocahontas.

About the year 1612 she was paying a visit to Japazous, chief of the Potomac Indians. At the same time Captain Argall, a man of much shrewdness and executive force, but infamous for his dishonest practices, was cruising up the Potomac; he quickly saw the advantage the English would gain in their negotiations with Powhatan for the return of a Mr. Scrivener, then a prisoner held by him, if he could secure so valuable a hostage as the chief's daughter. With a copper kettle he bribed Japazous, the chief with whom he was trading, and with whom she was staying, to entice her on board the vessel, when he detained her, much to the sorrow of the daughter of the wilderness, whose life had been hitherto as free as that of the wild animals of her native forest. To Jamestown, where she had often played as a child, and whither she had so often come as a friend, she was now carried a prisoner. When the old chief learned of the duplicity of the English, he, instead of entering into negotiations, at once prepared for war, but hostilities were averted by a remarkable event. This was nothing less than witness the ceremony, and soon after sent a bundle of deer skins as a present to his daughter and her husband.

Early in 1616 Rolfe and Pocahontas accompanied Sir Thomas Dale to England. Powhatan sent several Indians over with them, one of whom was commissioned to court the English. The arrival of the Lady Rebecca, as Pocahontas was called after her marriage, produced a great sensation in England. Captain Smith introduced her to the nobility, and Lady DeLaWare presented her at court. In the meantime Rolfe was appointed secretary and recorder general of Virginia, and must therefore return to the banks of the James. They accordingly visited Brentford and other places of note, and then repaired to Gravesend for the purpose of sailing to America; but while awaiting a ship, Pocahontas sickened and died of small pox (March, 1617), at the age of twenty-two. She left one son, who was educated by an uncle in London, and afterwards became a wealthy and distinguished character in Virginia, and from him some of the most prominent families of the Old Commonwealth trace their descent.

EARLY SETTLEMENTS.

The first white men within the present limits of the county were Jacob Martin and Stephen Sewell, who, in the year 1749, reached the mouth of Rappahannock, and erected a cabin on the banks of Greenbrier river, on what has ever since been known as Martin bottom, lying at the northern base of Martins mountain. (For an extended account of their settlement, see History of Greenbrier county, elsewhere found in this work.)

The second white men who were on Greenbrier river were John Lewis and his son Andrew (afterwards General Lewis), who in 1751 came over as the agents and surveyors for the Greenbrier land company, to which the British crown had granted 100,000 acres of land to be located in the valley of Greenbrier river. It was at this time that the elder Lewis became entangled in the dense growth of greenbriers which grew in the valley, and he declared that he would ever after call the stream upon the banks of which he was then surveying Greenbrier river—a

HER MARRIAGE TO JOHN ROLFE

An Englishman, who appears to have been a widower, and who having become enamoured with her beauty, wrote a formal letter to the governor, Sir Thomas Dale, proposing to convert her to Christianity and then marry her. This pleased the old governor, and was likewise acceptable to Powhatan. The marriage took place at Jamestown, in April, 1613, and was celebrated according to the rites of the English Church. The old chief sent an uncle of Pocahontas and two brothers to name by which it has ever since been known to English and American geographers.

THE MAN WHO FIRST CARRIED THE COMPASS IN THE GREENBRIER VALLEY,

As before stated, was John Lewis, a brief notice of whom is here given. He was a native of Ireland, descended from a family of Huguenots, who took refuge in that kingdom from the bloody persecutions that followed in the wake of the assassination of Henry IV. of France. He inherited a considerable estate, which he increased by industry and frugality, until he became the lessee of a contiguous property of considerable value. He married Margaret Lynn, daughter of the Lord of Loch Lynn, who was a descendant of the chieftains of a once powerful clan in the Scottish Highlands. By this marriage he had five sons, Thomas, Andrew, Samuel and William, born in Ireland, and Charles, the child of his old age, born a few months after his settlement amid the mountains of West Augusta. John Lewis arrived in Virginia in 1730, and in 1733 located and built Fort Lewis a few miles below the present city of Staunton, on a stream which still bears his name.

Like many others, his object was to obtain land, and patents are still extant by which his majesty granted to him a large portion of the fair domain of Western Virginia. For many years after the settlement at Fort Lewis, amity and good will existed between the neighboring Indians and the white settlers, whose numbers increased apace until they became quite a formidable colony. Then it was that the jealousy of their red neighbors became aroused, and a war broke out which, for cool though desperate courage and activity on the part of the whites, and ferocity, cunning and barbarity on the part of the Indians, was never equalled in any age or country. John Lewis was by this time well stricken in years, but his four sons, all of whom were now grown up, were well qualified to fill his place and to act the part of leaders to the gallant bands who so nobly battled for the protection of their homes and families, Thomas, the oldest son, labored under a defect of vision, which disabled him as a marksman, and he was, therefore, less efficient during the Indian war than his brethren. He was, however, a man of learning and sound judgment, and represented the county of Augusta for many years in the house of burgesses, was a member of the Virginia convention which ratified the constitution of the United States, and framed the constitution of Virginia, and afterwards represented the county of Rockingham in the general assembly of Virginia. He had four sons actively participating in the war of the Revolution, the youngest of whom bore an ensign's commission when but fourteen years of age.

Andrew, the second son, who was with his father at the mouth of Krapp's creek in 1751, was a soldier in Colonel George Washington's regiment during the French and Indian war, was at Braddock's defeat, and the siege and capitulation of Fort Mifflin July 4, 1754. He was twice wounded during the war, returned home and led the Big Sandy expedition to the Ohio river in 1756; commanded the southern division of the Virginia army at Point Pleasant in 1774 (see History of the Virginians), and upon the breaking out of the Revolution received and held a brigadier general's commission until 1780, when he resigned it and started home, but sickened and died of a fever in Bedford county, Virginia, when within forty miles of his home on the Roanoke.

Samuel, the third son, too, was a soldier in the old French war, he commanded a company in Washington's regiment, every one of his brothers serving under him. William, the fourth son, took an active part in the border wars, and was an officer in the Revolutionary army, in which one of his sons was killed and another maimed for life. When the British force under Jackson drove the legislature from Charlottesville to Staunton, the stiffness of the Sabbath eve was broken in the latter town by the beat of the drum, and volunteers were called for to prevent the passage of the British through the mountains at Rockfish. The elder sons of William Lewis were then absent with the northern army, these, however, were at home, whose ages were 17, 15, and 13 years. The father was confined to his bed by sickness, but his wife, with the firmness of a Roman matron, called them to her and bade them fly to the defense of their native land. "Go, my children," said she, "I spare not my youngest, my fair-haired boy, the comfort of my declining years, I devote you all to my country. Keep back the invader from the soil of Augusta, or see my face no more." When this incident was related to Washington he exclaimed, "Leave me but a banner to plant upon the mountains of West Augusta, and I will rally around me the men who will lift our bleeding country from the dust and set her free."

Charles, the fifth youngest son, fell at the head of his regiment when leading on an attack at Point Pleasant. He was esteemed the most skillful of all leaders of border warfare. Such were the sons and such was the father—the first surveyor in the Greenbrier Valley.

COLONEL JOHN McNEEL

Was one of the Earliest pioneers in the wilds of West Augusta and the first actual settler on the Little Levels, now in Pocahontas county. He was born near Winchester, Virginia, but early in life went to the Cumberland valley, in Maryland. Here, soon after his settlement, he had an altercation with a young man which resulted in a hand-to-hand fight, and Mr. McNeel, believing that he had killed his antagonist, fled to the wilderness, and after some time spent in wandering amid the wild solitudes of the Alleghenies, he came upon what has ever since been known as the Little Levels. It was a beautiful little valley, hemmed on all sides by lofty mountain ranges, and here the wanderer and, as he supposed, fugitive from justice, decided to make his future home. Here he raised his lonely cabin. This was about the year 1763, two years after the destruction of the Muddy Creek settlement in Greenbrier, and four years before Col. John Stuart came to the site of old Fort Union.

A short time after Mr. McNeel had occupied his cabin he was out hunting, nearly to his surprise, he met Charles and James Kennison, two white men, who were searching for a suitable site to found a home. From them he learned that the man whom he supposed he had killed, had not died and in fact had not been seriously injured. To him, this was joyful news, for the thought of having caused the death of a fellow-man was the most dreadful to contemplate. The Kennisons accompanied him to his lonely retreat, and with him as a guide soon found lands upon which they resolved to settle, then all three returned east of the mountains to make preparations for their removal into the wilderness.

During their stay in the valley Mr. McNeel wooed and won the heart and hand of a lady named Martha Davis. She was born in Wales in 1743, and at an early date had accompanied her parents to Virginia. Now she prepared to go to the wilderness and share the toils and hardships of a pioneer home. The man to whom she had given the best affections of her heart was worthy of the trust. All things were gotten ready, the journey made and the final home was reached. A few acres of land were cleared, and then, Mr. McNeel remembered his duty to his God, and with his own hands reared a small log cabin in which his neighbors and himself might worship Him who heareth the ravens when they cry, and who watcheth over the wanderer in the wilderness or the mariner upon the ocean. This temple dedicated by its builder to the worship of the Builder of the Universe was called the Whole Pole Church, and was, in all probability, the first ever erected west of the Alleghany mountains.

At length Dunmore's war broke out, and Mr. McNeel, together with his neighbors, the Kennisons, repaired to Camp Union, enlisted and accompanied General Lewis to Point Pleasant, where they participated in the bloody battle of October 10, 1774. During their absence a child of Mr. McNeel died, and the mother, heroic as she was, constructed a rock coffin, dug a narrow grave, and with her own hands laid the infant away to rest.

The soldiers returned but not to remain. The struggle between the Mother Country and her American Colonies was rapidly verging to a crisis, and they at once crossed the mountains and joined the patriot army, in which they served they saw the thirteen feeble colonies of 1776 the regenerated nation of 1783.

If the traveler who visits the beautiful little mountain town of Hillsboro, will stroll a mile and half to the north of that village he will reach a beautiful cemetery in which repose many of the pioneers of Pocahontas county. There sleep John McNeil and his wife, Charles and Edward Kennison and their wives, and several other heroes of Point Pleasant and patriots of the Revolution. No historian has inscribed their names high upon the pillar of fame, but their memory lives where they would have wished it to live—in the hearts of those who dwell among the mountains, where they themselves first planted the banner of civilization.

PETER LIGHTNER, THE BUILDER OF THE FIRST GRIST MILL.

Peter Lightner was among the first settlers in what is now Pocahontas county. He was a German-Dutchman and came from the eastern part of the State. He located on Knapps creek, and our informant says "he was a great blessing to the country which he came to help settle." Prior to his coming there were no mills nearer than Staunton, distant nearly a hundred miles through a trackless wilderness. This was too far to think of "going to mill," so the people prepared their own corn for bread. The mode was simple: a large tree was felled, from which a block or "cat" was taken, which when placed on end was probably as high as a man's waist. It was placed on end in front of the cabin, then a fire was kindled upon it, and so managed that an inverted cone was formed. From this the chaffed corn was taken and the "honey block" was ready for use. A peck or more of shelled corn was put in and pounded until it was reduced to a coarse meal, from which bread was then baked. Another plan was to boil the corn until it was quite soft, then pound into a patty, which was then dried and used as needed. This preparation was called honey meal. Mr. Lightner remedied all this. He erected a mill, and although some of the pioneers had to come thirty miles they considered it an easy task to provide bread. This mill was located on Knapps creek, and although nearly a hundred years have breathed their changeful breath upon the site, yet a trace of the race still remain to inform the observer that it once existed. Mr. Lightner sold this mill to John Bradshaw, who in turn sold it to Henry Harper. The buhrs are now in an old mill in Highland county, Virginia.

JOHN BRADSHAW—AND JOHN HARNESS, THE FIRST PEDDLER.

Another early pioneer was John Bradshaw, who reared his cabin home on the site where Huntersville, the county-seat, now stands. Soon after he located, the people of Bath county constructed a wagon road from the Warm Springs, through the mountains, to his house. This was the first public road ever opened within the present limits of Pocahontas county.

Soon after the opening of this thorough fare, a man named John Harness began hauling goods from Staunton into these mountains for the purpose of trading with the settlers. He made his headquarters at the house of Mr. Bradshaw, and here he opened out his stock in trade, which was largely made up of salt, coffee, powder, lead, a few pieces of calico, etc. Here he would be met by the hunters, who brought in their pelts, venison, ginseng, etc., and exchanged for that which they most needed. From this fact the place became known as Huntersville, a name which it has ever since retained.

THE ORIGINAL OWNER OF THE CLOVER LICK FARM

Was Jacob Warwick. He was one of the earliest settlers in that portion of Bath county now included in Pocahontas. He came from the southeastern part of Virginia, and his first settlement was on Jackson river. He owned a great many slaves, and after he patented the lands now known as the Clover Lick Farm, he came out and built a house, then covered several of his slaves to the land for the purpose of having them appraised. Among the number was one familiarly known as "Old Ben," who in the absence of Mr. Warwick acted as foreman and general manager.

A quantity of stock was brought out, and soon vast numbers of horses and cattle were running at large in the forest. On one occasion the proprietor came out to the farm to see how the work was progressing, and one morning during his stay, he and Ben rode some three miles up the stream to add the cattle, which when done they started to return, but had not proceeded far when they were fired upon by a band of Indians in ambush. But one ball took effect, and that pierced the body of the horse upon which Mr. Warwick rode. The horse fell to the ground, but at once recovered himself and the two dashed away at full speed, and reached the house in safety, but just as they reined up the wounded horse fell dead. Mr. Warwick mounted another which happened to be standing in the yard, and rode post haste to Jacksons river, while Old Ben gathered the slaves and took refuge in the mountains, and there remained until all danger was past.

OTHER PIONEERS

Of those who first occupied the cabin homes amid the mountains of this once wild and romantic region, the following are given in the census of the county, at the beginning of the present century: Isaac Moore, his wife and 6 children; Moses Moore, his wife and 4 children; Peter Lightner, his wife and 4 children; Henry Harper, his wife and 6 children; John Moore, his wife and 9 children; Felix Graves, his wife and 7 children; Samuel Waugh, his wife and 13 children; James Waugh, his wife and 12 children; Aaron Moore, his wife and 9 children; Robert Moore, his wife and 6 children; Timothy McCarty, his wife and 4 children; Andrew Gwin, his wife and 2 children; Sampson Mathews, his wife and 3 sons; Josiah Brown, his wife and 4 children; John Sharp, his wife and 1 child; William Sharp, his wife and 4 children; William Pogue, his wife and 4 children; John Baxter, his wife and 1 child; Levi Moore, his wife and 6 children; and John Bradshaw, his wife and 3 children.

It is not to be understood that the above embraces all, but it is believed that it includes very nearly the entire population at the time mentioned. The aggregate is 151. The parents have long since joined the silent majority on the other shore, and their posterity are scattered far and wide. Many have joined father and mother beyond the river. Many others have sought homes in distant States, while others yet reside in this and adjacent counties. James, a son of William Moore, lives near Edra and is now eighty years of age. Three sons of Samuel Waugh still reside within the county, John, a blacksmith, 68 years of age, and Jacob, a miller, both reside near Edra, and Beverly H., is a farmer, near Hillsboro. James Waugh, one of the pioneers, died in March, 1831, but five of his sons yet survive. Lorenzo lives in California; Jacob resided in Buckhannon, in Upshur county, Morgan in Jackson county, this State; James lives on Greatkiser river on a part of the old James Waugh farm, and is now nearly seventy years of age, and M. C. Waugh, the youngest son, now 52 years old, resides in this county.

POCAHONTAS COUNTY IN THE CIVIL WAR

In 1861 the clouds of war hung over America, and their deepest density rested over Virginia. Civil commotion shook the grand old Commonwealth, and the countenances of her sons but told the impending struggle, fierce and wild. Everywhere they enlisted in defense of their native State, and from the tide-washed shores, from the midland counties, and from the rock-ribbed Alleghenias, long lines of brave soldiers marched forth to battle and die upon a hundred crimsoned fields. Among them were many of the descendants of the first promoters of Pocahontas—they who, a century before, had struggled with the fierce and relentless barbarians, and had at last driven him from the country in which they had founded their homes where the soldiers of a later day were born and reared.

No sooner had the tocsin of war sounded throughout their native mountains than volunteering began. Captain Andrew G. McNeel repaired to the Little Levels and organized the first company. This was early in the spring of 1861. A requisition was made for arms, and they were shipped from Richmond, were never received, and the company disbanded in the fall of the same year. Captain D. A. Stoffer mustered a company at Huntersville, went south, and with it was attached to the 31st Virginia Infantry. John M. Lightner was first lieutenant in this company. The third company formed was that of Captain Arpogast, at Greenbank. It, too, was attached to the 31st Infantry. The captain was afterward promoted to major of the regiment. Lieutenant H. M. Peague, of this county, but serving in a Bath county company, was killed in action at Waverston, Virginia, October 12, 1863. Lieutenant James McGlothlin, of Captain Stoffer's company, from Huntersville, was wounded at Shepherdstown, and died at Winchester, Virginia.

ENGAGEMENTS IN POCAHONTAS

The first engagement which occurred in Pocahontas county, was at Camp Bartow, on what is known as the Peter Yeager farm, or the Traveler's Rest. Late in the summer of 1861, a Confederate force was collected at this point. It consisted of the 1st Georgia Infantry, Colonel Ramsey, commanding, the 12th Georgia, Colonel Edward Johnson in command, the 31st Virginia Infantry, Colonel William L. Jackson; Colonel Hamber's Battalion; the Churchville Cavalry, from Churchville, Augusta county, Captain James Somett in command, and the Rockbridge Cavalry, commanded by the captain, J. C. McNitt; the entire force under command of General Henry L. Jackson.

On the 14th of September, 1861, this force was attacked by the Federals under command of General Reynolds and Rosecrans. The fighting began early in the morning and continued until midnight, when the Federals withdrew and fell back to Cheat Mountain summit, in Randolph county. The Confederate loss was thirty-six killed, that of the Federals was unknown.

A few days later the Confederates fell back to Camp Alleghany, and after being re-entrained by two regiments, one of which was the 52nd Virginia

Infantry, under Colonel John Balden, they fortified a strong natural position. Here, in December, they were again attacked by the Federals, and the engagement continued throughout the day, but terminated as had the first, in the repulse of the Federals. The loss was considerable on both sides. Among that of the Confederates was that of Captain Anderson, of the Lynchburg Artillery, and Captain J. C. Whitner, of the Pocahontas Rifles.

THE BATTLE OF DROOP MOUNTAIN

Was fought on the 6th day of November, 1863. The Confederate force consisted of the 22nd Virginia Infantry, Colonel George Patton (of Kanawha county, afterward killed at Winchester), commanding, the 19th Virginia, Colonel W. F. Thompson, the 20th Virginia, Colonel W. W. Aron, the 14th Virginia Cavalry, Colonel James Cochran, Jackson's and Chapman's Batteries, and Edgar's and Derrick's Battalions; the entire force under command of General John Echols. This force, on the first of the month, was lying at Meadow Bluffs, in Greenbrier county.

The Federal force was composed of the 14th Pennsylvania Cavalry, 23d and 28th Ohio Infantry, the 5th 6th and 10th West Virginia Infantry, and one battery of Artillery. This force had been stationed at Beverly in Randolph county.

Both forces advanced and met on the northern extremity of Droop mountain, and the battle began at 10 A.M., and waged until 4 P.M., when the Confederates, finding their positions flanked, right and left, were forced to retreat; they fell back beyond Lewisburg, and were pursued several miles. The loss on both sides was heavy.

THE COUNTY RECORDS DURING THE WAR

At the time of the breaking out of the war, the Hon. William Curry was serving as both circuit and county clerk, and when it became evident that the Federals would invade the county, the court ordered Mr. Curry to remove the records to a place of safety. In compliance with this order he caused them to be taken to the private residence of Joel Hill, Esq., on the Little Levels. Here they remained until January, 1862, when Mr. Curry became alarmed as to the safety of so valuable a charge thus placed in his custody, and he therefore caused them to be removed to Covington, Virginia, where for a short time they lay in the clerk's office of Allegheny county. From here they were taken to the storeroom of Captain William Scott. In September, 1863, General Averill's command reached Covington, and Mr. Curry again removed the records, first to the residence of William Clark, and then to a stack of buckwheat straw, in which they lay concealed for three weeks, and were then conveyed into the mountains and stored away at the house of a Baptist minister, and here they remained until after the surrender at Appomattox. The storm of war had now passed away, and Mr. Curry, in June, 1865, returned with the records, and once more deposited them at the house of Joel Hill. Here they remained one month, and were then taken to a vacant house belonging to the Rev. Mitchell Dunlap, where they remained until September, 1865, when the first court after the close of the war convened (November, 1865), in the Methodist Church at Hillsboro. From that time they were kept in the old academy building until June, 1866, when they were taken back to the county seat and deposited at the house of John B. Garey. More than five years have passed away since their first removal, and strange to say, that notwithstanding all the vicissitudes of war through which they passed, but one thing was lost, and that was an old pocket book of no value. Was not Mr. Curry true to his trust? Let those interested in the records of Pocahontas answer.

CHURCHES, SCHOOLS, AND NEWSPAPERS

THE FIRST PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH

The first Presbyterian Church ever organized within the present limits of the county was that known as the Oak Grove Church on the Little Levels, in the year 1799. For a period of thirty-seven years after its organization it had neither pastor or stated supply, the only preaching being by ministers from distant fields who occasionally visited this mountainous section. From all that can now be learned, it is believed that the first minister who here proclaimed the glad tidings of salvation was the Rev. John McCue. After him came the Rev. Mr. Loomis. His successor was the celebrated John McElhenny, D. D., who preached for many years at the Oak Grove Church, and did much toward securing its permanency.

In the year 1839 this church was reorganized by the Rev. S. L. Graham and at the time numbered but nine members, including four deacons, who were Josiah Beard, George Poage, John Jordan and S. D. Poage. Mr. Graham continued to be the pastor of this church for thirty-nine years, when he was succeeded by the Rev. J. S. Rame, then, in the order named, by the Revs. D. S. Cunningham, William Brown, Joseph Brown, M. D. Dunlap, James Kerr, G. L. Brown, and D. S. Sydenstricker, the present incumbent. The present membership is 76.

LITTLE LEVELS ACADEMY.

This institution was established in 1842, under a charter granted by the State of Virginia. The incorporators were Josiah Beard, S. D. Poage, Samuel L. Mathews, Moses H. Poage, John Hill, Thomas Hill, James Miller, and Richard McNeel. The first principal was the Rev. Joseph Brown, who served as such for a period of seven years. He was succeeded by the Rev. M. D. Dunlap, who remained at the head of the institution for eleven years, or until the year 1860, when the war came on and the school closed. In 1865 the county purchased the building, since which time it has been used for public school purposes. This was the first school of a high order in the county, and notwithstanding the short period of its existence, it left its impress upon the educational interests of this mountain region.

NEWSPAPERS.

The only newspaper that has ever been published in the county is the Pocahontas Times, the first number of which made its appearance on the 10th day of May, 1863, with James B. Canfield and Hensleigh B. Marshall, publishers and editors. It is an 8-page quarto, 5-column paper, and is devoted to the interests of Pocahontas county in particular, and to those of the State in general. The press upon which it is printed was first used in the office of the Pocono Lubricator, of Wood county. Afterward it was taken to Beverly and used in printing the Randolph Review - now the Randolph Enterprise - and the Myrtle Tree, Masonic organ published at that place. Later it was purchased by Canfield & Marshall and brought to Pocahontas, where it is now used in printing the Times.

MINOR CIVIL DIVISIONS

On the 31st day of July, 1863, the legislature of West Virginia passed a bill entitled "An act to provide for the division into townships of the various counties composing this State." Appended to that bill was a schedule, in which several gentlemen were named in each county whose duty it was to perform the work in their respective counties. Those named for Pocahontas were: William R. Moore, J. N. Fray, Morgan Anderson, David M. Burge, and John Sharp, sr. In most of the counties the work was performed, but Pocahontas was too much torn by war for any business of civil character to be transacted. Her records were led away in the mountains of Alleghany county, and no courts were being held; consequently nothing was done until 1866, when it was resolved that the old magisterial districts, as they existed under the old State, should remain the same, and be known as townships under the new. This is the only county in the State, so far as the writer knows, which has preserved its old subdivisions, which were and are now: Greenbank, No. 1, Huntersville, No. 3; Edra, No. 2, and Levelton, No. 4. A brief notice of each is here given.

GREENBANK DISTRICT, NO. 1.

This is the most northern district of the county. It is bounded on the north and northwest by Randolph county, east by Pendleton and Highland counties, and south by Huntersville and Edra districts. The surface is broken and mountainous, in the north are lofty ranges of the Rich and Alleghany mountains; while in the east are the western spurs of the Alleghenies proper. In the west are the Pine and Elk mountains, a southern continuation of the Cheat range of Randolph. Elk Knob, in the southwestern part of this district, attains a height of more than 3,000 feet, and is among the highest peaks in the State. The fountain streams of the Greenbrier river constitute the drainage system. Among them are the east and west prongs of Greenbrier, Little Bear, Deer creek, North fork of Deer creek, and Leather Bark creek.

HUNTERSVILLE DISTRICT, NO. 3.

Embraces the greater part of the eastern half of the county. To the north lies Green Bank district, while on the east it is separated from Highland and Bath counties in Old Virginia, by the summit of the Alleghany range. On the south lies Levelton district, and on the west is Edra. West of the center, and extending northeast from near Huntersville, almost to the northeast boundary, are the Brown mountains. In the southern part is a series of mountains called the Beaver Lick range. It is crowned by several lofty peaks. Just south of the latter is a level plateau, or table-land of considerable extent; it is covered with a lofty forest of white pine, and is locally known as the White Pine Plateau. Knapps creek and its tributaries drain the entire surface. The latter are: Little Backs creek, Doughards creek, Cochran creek, and Browns creek.

The first settlers in this district were Moses Moore, John Bradshaw and Peter Lightner, both of the latter have already been mentioned. But they were not long permitted to enjoy the solitude of their lonely home alone, for other pioneers came and settled beside them.

The schools of a century ago were what were called "subscription," or "select," and were usually taught for a few months in the year by one of the pioneers, who in his youth had enjoyed superior education advantages. The text books used were Dilworth's spelling, and some work frequently the table as a reader. The first of these schools in this district was "kept" in a deserted log cabin, which stood on the banks of Knapps creek, not far from where Huntersville, the county seat, now stands. It was a "two-sided" structure, one side of which was taken up with a large fire place. The seats were made by splitting small logs in halves and inserting pins for legs in the oval sides. Who the first teacher was is not now known, and never will be, for there is no record, and the oldest person now living cannot remember.

Neither can it be known who preached the first sermon, but the names of many pioneer ministers are remembered. Everywhere in the settlement of the West the frontier preacher was an important factor, and scarcely was the roof of the cabin made fast before the Methodist circuit rider or the Baptist missionary made his appearance, collected the neighbors, preached a sermon, left an appointment for some time, perhaps a year in the future, then after a friendly farewell he continued his journey to another settlement. Among those who first visited what is now Pocahontas county were the Revs. James Aves, John Miller, Amos Smith, J. W. Kenney, James Watts, Samuel Ellis, William P. McDowell, Eliza Knox, James Kerr, William Houston, Harvey Sawyer, N. Pendleton and John Howe. The first Presbyterian church of Huntersville was organized in 1854, by the Rev. Mitchell Dundup. Among the first members were: Hugh McCloshlin, sr., James A. Price, and George E. Craig. A house of worship was erected the same year. On the 12th day of August, 1854, William Gannon, Benjamin Herold, and James T. Lockridge, on behalf of the church, contracted with David W. Kerr for the construction of the church at the cost of $1,100.

The Methodist Episcopal (South) Church of Huntersville, was organized in 1866, by the Rev. Sime. Before the division of the church in 1844 into northern and southern branches, the Methodists had an organization at this place but the Huntersville Church then belonged to what was known as the Lexington circuit.

Mount Vernon Church, built in 1876 was the first ever erected on Knapps creek but its erection 1860 was raised by subscription, and the remainder was paid by Andrew W. Moore, Moses Moore and Preston Moore. It was dedicated in June, 1882, and the Rev. - McClure became the first pastor. It is a good substantial building, and is heated by stoves. During the late war the soldiers made a barracks of it, and at one time threatened to burn it, but were prevailed upon to desist from such an act of vandalism, and to-day it stands a monument of the religious zeal and Christian enthusiasm of a generation now passed away. Among the first members were Leonard Heston, Jennie Heston, George Rider, Harvey Curry, Mary A. Curry, Moses Moore, Isabelle Moore, Preston Moore, Andrew Moore Anna Moore, and Elizabeth Lightner. George Rider was the first class-leader, and the Rev. L. Fox is the present pastor.

Huntersville, the county seat, is the only town in the district. It was laid out in 1821, and is situated on the left bank of Knapps creek, six miles from its mouth. It is surrounded on all sides by lofty mountains, and has, perhaps, more the appearance of an Alpine village than any town in the State. Its elevation is 1900 feet above the Atlantic. It contains the county buildings, two general mercantile stores, one hotel, one postoffice, one newspaper—the Pocahontas Times—and about a dozen dwellings.

Moses Moore, already mentioned as one of the first settlers, located on Knapps creek more than one hundred years ago, as is attested by records yet extant. There was an old Indian trail, or "Valley Draft," as it was once called, by which the savages traveled when on their missions of blood to the settlements on Jackson river and in the Shenandoah valley. This trail led near by where Moses Moore settled—viz., on the land now owned by his grandson, Andrew W. Moore, and, as might have been expected, it was not long before he was carried into captivity, but at last made his escape and returned to his mountain home. But twice more saw the savages were dared beyond the Ohio, was he carried a prisoner to their towns on the Susque. After his return the last time he purchased all the land lying on Knapps creek, from where Rogers River now flows up to the church now standing on the farm of Andrew Harold. This tract included several thousand acres, and, as the records show, Mr. Moore gave in exchange for it two steel traps and two pounds sterling money.

EDRA DISTRICT, NO. 2,

Lies in the western part of the county, and is bounded north by Randolph county, northeast by Greenbrier district, east by Huntersville district, south by Levinston, and west by Webster county. Here, as elsewhere in the county, the surface is rough and mountainous. In the north are the Middle mountains and southern continuations of the Elk and Cheat ranges; in the centre are the Black mountains, while in the east and southeast rise the lofty peaks of Buckleys, Marling and Shashy ranges.

The principal drainage is to the west, with the exception of Sago creek, Stony creek, and one or two other small streams which flow east and fall into Greenbrier, all the streams flow west and form the headwaters of Gauley and Elk rivers. They have been named in the general view of the county.

The first cabin built within the limits of this district was that erected by Martin Sewell near the present site of Greenbrier Bridge, in the year 1749. (For a full account of their improvement see History of Greenbrier county, found elsewhere in this work.) The first actual settlers, those who found what they were in search of—homes—were Thomas Drennon, Jacob Warwick, William Sharp, Robert Moore, John Johnson, Thomas Johnson, Robert Gay, William Poage, Patrick Slatery, Robert Duffie, Thomas Brock, Lawrence Drennon and John Smith.

The first grist mill was built by Jonathan McNeal, in the early part of the present century. It was located on Sago creek a short distance from its mouth. It was a round pole structure, with one run of small buhrs, adapted to grinding corn only. Water was the propelling power, and motion was communicated to the stones by an old-fashioned "over shot" wheel. The first saw mill was erected on the waters of Stony creek. It was a frame building, with the old-fashioned ash saw, and was a primitive affair.

The first school ever taught in the district was in a log cabin which stood on the lands now the property of Robert Gay. The teacher was Mary Warwick, who taught her first term in the winter of 1809. It is said that several of the parents accompanied their children to this school and learned to read with them. There are now nineteen good public school buildings in the district, in which competent teachers are employed to teach 507 boys and girls the rudiments of an English education.

The first postoffice was Edra, and since its establishment four others have been added, viz., Marling Bottom, Clover Lick, Split Rock and Buckeye Cove.

Who preached the first sermon, or when the first church was organized, cannot now be known. For, like much of the frontier church history elsewhere, it is lost in the oblivion of bygone years. All that is now known of it is that it was a Methodist congregation on Stony creek, and that William McCollum, John Smith, John Barlow and John Sharp were among the first members, and that the last-named was the first class leader.

Of those mentioned as the pioneers of the district, several were soldiers with General Lewis in the battle of Point Pleasant, and among them was Thomas Drennon. He was the first settler on the land where Edra post office is now located, and soon after he erected his cabin it was attacked (in his absence) by the Indians, who killed his wife and a woman named Smith, and carried to son Charles into captivity. When Mr. Drennon returned home and beheld his home in ruins, his beloved wife cold in death, and thought of his son perhaps reserved for a worse fate, his heart failed within him, but a few days later he repaired to Fort Union and became a volunteer in the army then concentrating. He accompanied it to Point Pleasant, participated in the battle and in the march beyond the Ohio.

At the close of the war he returned to his mountain home, but there all ties for him were severed, and he resolved to journey to the west, and there among savage tribes search for his beloved son. On the eve of his departure on his hazardous mission a few of his neighbors gathered to bid him God speed. Then, with his rifle, he pushed out into the wilderness. A long year passed away and there were no tidings of him, for there were none to bring them, and his friends yielded reluctantly to the belief that he had fallen a victim to savage cruelty. But not so; he had journeyed far to the northwest, had crossed the strait, and found his long-lost son in the possession of a trader near Detroit. The homeward journey was begun, and at last both reached home and lived long in what is now Pocahontas county.

LEVELTON DISTRICT, NO. 4.

Is the most southern sub-division of the county. It derives its name from the plateau or flat lying north of Deep mountain. This flat embraces an area of several square miles, and is one of the most fertile spots in the Alleghany mountains. North of it, stretching away to the west, are the Yew mountains, while in the east is the Cranberry range, a southern offshoot of the Cheat mountain system. About four miles west of Hillsboro, stands Mount Bayard, towering to the height of 4,000 feet; it is the highest point of land in West Virginia. Viewed from Hillsboro, in the morning sunlight, it is an object of sublime grandeur. It is named in honor of Delaware's distinguished senator. To the south, Old Deep mountain, named from its peculiar shape, stands out prominently against the horizon. It is the historic mountain of the State, for here once struggled many thousand men in mortal combat.

The first settlement was made here in 1743, by John McNeel and the Kennisons, they have been noticed in the general history of the county. The first white child ever born within the limits of the district, was the infant of John and Martha McNeel and is the name which was borne by the mother. Father early settlers were James Lewis, Alexander Wood, James McNeill, John Kennison, Richard Hill, William Kennison, Abraham McNeel, Nathaniel Kennison, William Kennison, David Kennison, Joseph Beard, Thomas Beard and John Beard.

The first grist mill was built by Valentine Cackley, in the year 1800. It was located at what has ever since been called Mill Point, a short distance north of Hillsboro. It was a round pole structure, with one run of small stones; water was the propelling power. Prior to the erection of this mill, the people depended upon the hand mill and hominy block. In the year 1808, Mr. Cackley added a sawing apparatus; and he thus became not only the builder of the first grist mill, but of the first saw mill as well.

The first school was taught by Thomas Green, in the year 1798, in a rude cabin which stood one and a half miles north of Hillsboro, on lands now owned by W. L. McNeel. This pioneer temple of learning was a round pole structure with a clapboard roof, held in place by weight-poles, the floor was mother earth. Instead of windows, a log was chopped from one side, and over the aperture was pasted greased paper as a substitute for glass. There are at present twelve white and two colored schools in the district; 476 pupils attend the former, and 56 the latter.

It is said that Bishop Asbury, the great apostle of Methodism, was the first minister who visited the Little Levels, and that as early as 1789 he preached in the little "White Pole Church," erected by John McNeel, as elsewhere mentioned. The tradition is doubtless true, for it is substantiated by general records of the church. It appears that the first organization was perfected here in the last named year, and at the time the members composing the church were John McNeel, Martha McNeel, James Lewis and wife, Alexander Wadell and wife, Charles Kennison, Jacob Kennison, Mrs. James Brinnell, John Switzer and wife, Richard Hill, Nancy Hill, and Abraham McNeel and wife.

Hillsboro, the only village in the district, is situated on the Little Levels, 34 miles northeast of Lewisburg, and 17 miles southwest of Huntersville, the county seat. It was laid out in 1843, by Joseph Brown, a Presbyterian minister and school teacher. The original proprietors were John Hills, David Page, Nathaniel Kennison and James Lewis.

PERSONAL HISTORY DEPARTMENT OF
POCAHONTAS COUNTY

NO. 1 DISTRICT

BENJAMIN F. JACKSON—is a native of North Carolina, born in Pasquotank county, October 15, 1819, a son of Benjamin M. and Prina (West) Jackson, now both deceased. At the age of eleven years he left his native State and accompanied an uncle to Indiana, where he lived until he attained his majority. He then made the journey from Indiana to North Carolina, in 1840, on horseback, and after a short stay at his old home he settled in Pendleton county, (then) Virginia, where he married and engaged in farming, tanning and a general mercantile trade. His first wife was Ruth, daughter of Samuel and Jane (Armstrong) Wilson, both now deceased, and she was born in Pendleton county, August 27, 1825. She married Mr. Jackson on the 22d of July, 1841, and died May 16, 1869, in Pocahontas county, where they had been at that date living thirteen years. Their children were ten: John S., born March 12, 1843; Virginia J., October 19, 1844; Hannah E., July 8, 1847; Indiana M., July 18, 1850; Ohio M., June 3, 1852; Nebraska D., May 16, 1854; William K., June 27, 1856; Samuel L., May 21, 1862; Andrew H., March 3, 1865; Edgar H., May 10, 1867—the oldest and youngest sons live with their father; Samuel lives in Staunton, Virginia, and Andrew in Huttonsville, Randolph county, West Virginia, and the other children at Dunmore, this county. After fifteen years of successful business in Pendleton county, Mr. Jackson came to where he now resides in Pocahontas county, and went to farming and raising stock. His present wife was Juliana Armstrong, and the children born to them are: Mary Susan, born March 9, 1873; Clarence, October 30, 1874; Benjamin F., Jr., December 4, 1876; George A., July 23, 1879; Ida H., August 16, 1882. Benjamin F. Jackson's postoffice address is in Dunmore, Pocahontas county, West Virginia.

ISAAC MOORE—son of Isaac Moore, now deceased, was born in Pocahontas county, April 21, 1820. In Greenbank, this county, October 29, 1846, he married Almida H. Arbogast, who was a daughter of William and Jane G. (Tollman) Arbogast, and was born in this county, September 6, 1827. Her father died in February, 1847. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Moore were seven: W. Crawford, born January 12, 1849, died October 27, 1861; Marietta, born February 14, 1851, lives in Buchanan, Upshur county, this State; C. Rice, born May 21, 1853, lives at Clover Lick, this county; Ernest N., born January 5, 1856, lives at Glade Hill, this county; M. Florence, October 4, 1859, lives in Dunmore, this county; C. Forrest, January 28, 1863, lives at Nashville, Tennessee; Harry M., April 8, 1869, lives at home. Isaac Moore is a farmer and hunter, one of the best informed and most successful agriculturists in the county. That the resources of the county, its adaptability to grazing purposes may be fully known, he has recorded in this ENCYCLOPEDIA the following from his labor statistics. On his farm in the year 1882 there was raised and sold stock to the amount of $15,000, without mention of the stock fed and held unsold. Robert Moore, the pioneer elsewhere spoken of, was the grandfather of Isaac Moore. Isaac Moore's post office address is Dunmore, Pocahontas county, West Virginia.

C. B. SWECKER—born in Virginia, has been a resident among the people of Pocahontas county since 1877. David W. and Celia F. (Engle) Swickert were his parents, and he married Nebraska D., daughter of Benjamin F. and Ruth (Wilson) Jackson. She was born in Pocahontas county, and her family record is given with her father's sketch on this page, October 11, 1876, was the marriage day of C. B. Swecker and Nebraska D. Jackson, and Kemp D., their only child, was born July 19, 1878. C. B. Swecker is a skilled mechanic in the trade of cabinet-making, in architecture and in painting. He also follows the calling of architect, and is the postmaster at Dunmore, Pocahontas county, West Virginia.

NO. 2 DISTRICT

L. R. APPERSON—was born in Hancock, Virginia, June 24, 1836, son of William and Elizabeth J. (Harris) Apperson. His parents left his native county in 1854, and came to Randolph county, (then) Virginia. In 1861, L. R. Apperson enlisted in the Confederate army, Company F, 1st Virginia Infantry, and in 1863 he was commissioned captain. October 3, 1864, he was made prisoner, near Port Republic, and taken to Fort Delaware, and held until the close of the war. During his active service he was three times wounded; once struck with a sabre. In Pocahontas county, February 23, 1868, he married Sarah M. Kee, and the children of their union are: Minnie M., born May 21, 1870; Charles R., November 28, 1873; Quintilla M., February 26, 1877. Sarah M., wife of Mr. Apperson, was born in Pocahontas county, December 5, 1843, daughter of William and Ruth D. (McCollum) Kee, natives of this county. J. R. Apperson has been a resident in Pocahontas county since 1870, is merchant and artist, and is at this time postmaster at Martins Bottom, at which place he is erecting one of the finest residences in the county.

GEORGE BAXTER—was a son of William and Elizabeth (Rankin) Baxter, his father born in Bath county, Virginia, in 1808, and his mother in Pocahontas county in 1814. William Baxter came to Pocahontas county when young and made the home of his wedded life here, and George Baxter was born in Edra district, February 26, 1841. William Baxter died in September, 1881, and his widow followed him to the land of rest in the succeeding month, January 8, 1886. George Baxter wedded Sarah Ann, daughter of James R. and Elizabeth L. Pugh. She died on the 6th of April, 1881, leaving him with six children, born: John Wilks, April 4, 1867; Mary Elizabeth Rinde, July 11, 1869; Adam Oscar, August 16, 1873; Abie Belle Frances, February 19, 1876; Georgia Ann May, May 17, 1878; James William Edie, April 1, 1881. At Edra, February 16, 1882, Margaret Jane Casel became the wife of George Baxter, and they have one daughter, Eliza Myrtle, born December 24, 1882. Samuel and Mary Eliza Valentine (Turnbleson) Casel were the parents of Margaret J., and she was born in Green Bank district, Pocahontas county, March 29, 1853. Her parents were Virginians, her father born in Bath county in 1815, and her mother in Augusta county in 1822. They settled in Pocahontas county before their marriage, about 1834, and Samuel Casel died June 1, 1882, at his home in Green Bank district. George Baxter is a practical surveyor, and held the office of county surveyor in 1870-1, was again elected in 1880, his official term, which he is still serving, extending over the years 1881-4. His post office address is Edra, Pocahontas county, West Virginia.

REV. ABNER M. CHAPPELL—born in Loudoun county, Virginia, March 14, 1848, is a son of James M. and Susan P. (Black) Chappell, he, Shepherstown, Jefferson county, West Virginia, July 29, 1870, he was joined in wedlock with Catharine S. Lloyd, and they made their home in Pocahontas county in the present year. They have four children: Susan C., born August 1, 1872; James E., April 26, 1874; Prudence K., September 2, 1878; Ada Grace, January 11, 1882. Catharine S., wife of Mr. Chappell, was born in Loudoun county, Virginia, on the 3d of April, 1852, and she is a daughter of Harrison and Eliza (Maunder) Lloyd. Abner M. Chappell has been a local minister for eleven years, and is a member of the Virginia Methodist Episcopal Conference. His post office address is Edra, Pocahontas county, West Virginia.

JOHN GAY—resides on the place where he was born, in Edra district, No. 2, Pocahontas county. The date of his birth was May 26, 1804, and Robert and Hannah (Moore) Gay, pioneers of the county, were his parents. His father came to this county from Rockbridge county, Virginia, before the Indians had abandoned the soil, and while the white settlers still lived in fear of the tomahawk and torch of the savage. Robert Gay settled first on Thomy creek, then moved to land now owned by Jacob Sharp, then to the farm now owned by his grandson Levi. Here he built first a cabin, and then a part of the house now occupied by his son. In Huntersville, Pocahontas county, June 24, 1834, John Gay was united in marriage with Margaret B. Clark, who was born in Cecil county, Maryland, June 19, 1810. John and Elizabeth V. (Miller) Clark were her parents, and both died in Augusta county, Virginia. Her father died September 30, 1836, and her mother died January 30, 1839. The father of John Gay died March 22, 1834, and his mother died August 15, 1849. The children of John Gay and wife are recorded: Samuel M., born May 29, 1835, lives in Pocahontas county. Hannah E., February 23, 1837, died January 1, 1862; Susan Jane, born January 25, 1839, married Adam C. Young, and they live in Pocahontas county. Levi, born December 22, 1840, is sheriff of Pocahontas county, and lives at home. Harriet, born January 3, 1843, died December 26, 1861. Ann Maria, born July 8, 1845, married Jacob S. Moore, November 24, 1870, and they live in this county. Edward, born October 10, 1847, lives at home; James R. B., April 29, 1850, died January 2, 1881; Sallie Hamilton, born April 30, 1853, died December 21, 1857. Samuel and Levi served in the Confederate army, 31st Virginia Infantry, and both were wounded. Levi was wounded at the battle of Spotsylvania Court House, and Samuel at the battle of Strasburg. John Gay is farming and raising stock. He was twenty-eight years justice of the peace, was deputy sheriff, 1828-9, and represented Pocahontas county in the Virginia legislature from 1839 to 1841, and from 1843 to 1845. His address is Martins Bottom, Pocahontas county, West Virginia.

son, who came to Pocahontas county in the year 1800, and son of Robert Flinn (Brulley) Moore, was born in Edra district, this county, January 7, 1838. His parents were both natives of Pocahontas county, and died in Iowa, his father's death occurring in Cedar county, in 1875, and his mother departing this life in Davis county, in 1872. The first wife of George P. Moore was Elizabeth M. Poage, and he married his second wife, Ruth J. Gay, at Edra. She was born at Doe Hill, Highland county, Virginia, on the 30th of June, 1844, and her marriage day was on the anniversary of her birth in 1865. Robert T. and Elizabeth (Wilson) Gay were her parents, and her father died in 1875. At the time of the elder Robert Moore's settlement in Pocahontas county the country was in the pioneer stage of its existence, the nearest store being thirty miles distant. George P. Moore has lived all his life in this district, within a quarter of a mile of the place of his birth, and has held nearly all the offices in the gift of his fellow-townsmen. He did not take part in the civil war, except to act as depot quartermaster's agent at Edra. In 1866 he received the appointment of postmaster at Edra, and with the exception of the years of the war he held the office ever since, and is still the incumbent. He has also served acceptably as justice of the peace.

JAMES WAUGH—one of the farming residents of Edra district, Pocahontas county, was here born December 11, 1814. James and Rebecca (McGuire) Waugh were his parents. His father died in March 1831, and his mother in July, 1867. The first marriage of James Waugh was with Sarah Cochran, who died October 13, 1868. Near McDowell, Highland county, Virginia, was born Hannah A. Lamb, April 22, 1848, and in the place of her birth she became the wife of James Waugh, January 4, 1872. They have one son, Rudolph T., born January 22, 1879. John Lamb, father of Mrs. Waugh, died in 1882, and his mother, whose maiden name was Frances Bright, is still living. James Waugh took no part in the war between the States, but was commissioned by the governor to look after suffering families in his neighborhood. He had charge of some thirty families, Union and Confederate alike, who would have suffered unpeakable hardships but for his protection. He receives his mail at Edra, Pocahontas county, West Virginia.

NO. 3 DISTRICT

AMOS BARLOW—born in Pocahontas county, January 11, 1831, was a son of natives of this county. John and Martha (Waddell) Barlow. His father was born November 28, 1781, and died January 23, 1866, his mother was born January 12, 1790, and died October 7, 1872. The first wife of Amos Barlow was Mary Ann Moore, and their children were two: July F., born February 12, 1852, died September 5, 1861; M. Agnes, born June 20, 1855, died August 3, 1875. In Edra, this county, February 22, 1859, Amos Barlow was united in marriage with Mary S. Pogue, who was born in Pocahontas county, May 8, 1843. James R. and Elizabeth L. (Harper) Pogue, natives of and residents in Pocahontas county, are her parents. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Barlow are five, born: Letcher D., June 20, 1860; Lucy B., May 6, 1868; Willie H., March 17, 1875; Samuel L., April 7, 1877; Frank Pryce, March 6, 1880—the oldest lives in Greenbank, this county, and the others at home. Amos Barlow is a merchant at Huntersville, and in business is achieving that success that results on an honest and upright business man. He was almost ruined in finances by the impact of the civil war, but by perseverance and integrity has re-established himself in business.

ELISHA C. CANFIELD—was born in Leesdenville, Randolph county, (then) Virginia, March 9, 1828, and in that county, October 24, 1850, he married Margaret Waddell, who was born at New Market, Randolph county. Their children are seven: Arthur W., born August 1, 1851; William P., August 3, 1853; Lucinda J., October 31, 1854; James R., April 23, 1856; David B., May 31, 1858; Levi C., November 20, 1861; Francis M., April 9, 1865. James R. is one of the editors of the Pocahontas Times, at Huntersville, this county, and the others are living in Leesdenville, Randolph county, where Elisha C. Canfield has a farm. Amos and Nancy A. (Schroover) Canfield were the parents of Elisha C., and his wife is a daughter of John and Elizabeth A. (Kettle) Wilmoth. The parents of both are deceased. His father died November 12, 1881, and his mother died December 29, 1880. Elisha C. Canfield's post office address is Upper Cheat, Randolph county, West Virginia.

WILLIAM CURRY—son of John and Jane Curry, was born in Bath county, Virginia, November 28, 1831. In 1853 he made his home in Pocahontas county, and in this county, on the 21st of February, 1850, he married Lucy, daughter of Joel and Rebecca Hill. She was born in Pocahontas county, September 21, 1841, and their children were born: Rebecca C., August 21, 1861; Sherman P., November 24, 1865; Mary C., June 1, 1870; Lillie L., December 12, 1873. From March, 1853, to January 1, 1879, William Curry was clerk of the circuit and county courts of Pocahontas county (a portion of the time acting as deputy clerk). He is now one of the substantial farmers of the county, with post office address at Huntersville, Pocahontas county, West Virginia.

PLEASANT A. DILLEY—son of William and Betsey (Baker) Dilky, and Lillie McCarty, daughter of George and Eliza (Harold) McCarty, were united in marriage in Ironton, Lawrence county, Ohio, in 1873. Both were natives of Huntersville, the former born February 20, 1852, and the latter on the 26th of May, 1858. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Dilky were born: Lillie G., December 28, 1874; Mary Alice, January 3, 1876; Clarence S., July 27, 1877; William C., May 29, 1879.

Emma S., February 23, 1882. All are at home with their parents in Huntersville district, where Mr. Dilley is successfully conducting a blacksmithing business. Post office address, Huntersville, Pocahontas county, West Virginia.

ANDREW HEROLD—born in Pocahontas county, August 7, 1831, and Maria Seibert, born in this county May 13, 1831, were here joined in wedlock, on the 23d of August, 1849. Their children were ten, born: Lanty W., July 18, 1850; Millard F., October 11, 1851; Joseph S., June 2, 1854; Isaac N., July 18, 1856; John Leitcher, December 11, 1858; Horace F., August 27, 1862; Edwin Lee, December 7, 1864; Ida R., August 27, 1867; Andrew F., January 2, 1870; Bruyn P., November 12, 1873. Edwin and Joseph are deceased, Isaac is in Missouri. Lanty W. is farming and grazing on Knapps creek, and the others are at home. Christopher and Elizabeth (Cook) Herold, now both deceased, were parents of Andrew Herold, and his wife was a daughter of Joseph Seibert, now deceased, and Rebecca (Lockridge) Seibert. Lanty W. Herold, for whom the sketch is compiled, has a number of sheep ranges in Pocahontas county, and is successfully grazing, and trading in cattle. There is no man in West Virginia of his years better posted in sheep raising. The Herold family reside on Knapps creek, and have their post office address at Frost, Pocahontas county, West Virginia.

JAMES T. LOCKRIDGE—son of Lanty and Elizabeth (Beason) Lockridge, was born in Pocahontas county in 1821. His parents are both deceased, his father's death occurring in 1859. In 1854, in the State of Iowa, James T. Lockridge married Eliza R. Moser, and their children are four: Florence, born April 9, 1856; Horace M., April 10, 1858; Laura L., May 29, 1859; James Bedford, May 3, 1862. Florence lives in Iowa, the others at home. Philip Moser, Jr., in 1827 married Charlotte Wilcox, and their daughter Eliza R. was born in Philadelphia, in 1815. Her mother was of distinguished English family, and

Mrs. Lockridge has a copy of her grandfather's coat-of-arms, the armorial device: "He beareth (argent, a lion rampant between three crescent saules) a chert very." This is the coat-of-arms of Samuel Wilcox of Tarrantum High Cross, in the county of Middlesex. Philip and Sophia Moser, born about 1735, were the parents of Philip, Jr., father of Mrs. Lockridge, and he was born December 16, 1770. He had ten sisters and two brothers, all of whom died previous to March, 1830. James T. Lockridge has always been identified with the best interests of his native county since reaching manhood's estate, and is now a magistrate of Huntersville district, where he is farming and raising stock. He was colonel in the State militia for a number of years, and a member of the Virginia legislature from 1858 to 1862. Horace M., the eldest son, one of the enterprising men of the younger generation in this county, is the present superintendent of public schools in Pocahontas county. His post office address is Huntersville, Pocahontas county, West Virginia.

HUGH P. McGLAUGHLIN—son of Samuel G. and Elizabeth (Weight) McGlaughlin, was born in Highland county, Virginia, August 1, 1843, and his home has been in Pocahontas county since he was nine years of age. His father died March 20, 1844. His grandparents were among the first and most prominent settlers in this part of Pocahontas county, and amassed considerable property here. Hugh P. McGlaughlin enlisted in Company I, 25th Virginia Infantry, and served through the war between the States in the Confederate army. For eleven months of the time he was a prisoner, taken first to Point Lookout, and thence to Elmira, New York. He had one brother in the service who died at the Elmira prison, of scurvy, on the 11th of November, 1864. Returning to Pocahontas county after the close of the war, Hugh P. McGlaughlin engaged in farming, which is still his occupation, and in which he is achieving a success rarely attained in a hilly country. In 1869, in Pocahontas county, he married Ahinda Bird, who was born in Highland county, Virginia, in 1848. She was a daughter of George H. and Mary (Wiley) Bird, and her mother died in 1851. Emma A., born October 7, 1874, and Charles A., born March 15, 1880, are the children of Mr. and Mrs. McGlaughlin. For a number of years, Mr. McGlaughlin has been constable and clerk of the board of overseers of the poor. His post office address is Huntersville, Pocahontas county, West Virginia.

ANDREW WASHINGTON MOORE is descended from the pioneer Moses Moore, elsewhere mentioned in this work, one of the most hardy pioneers of the county and sustaining an enviable reputation as a woodsman. The Moore family are Virginians, and have been since its organization prominent in the affairs of Pocahontas county. Andrew W. has been overseer of the poor, president of the school board, and has held a number of county and district offices. He was a son of Isaac and Margaret (Wilson) Moore, now both deceased, and was born on the farm where he now resides. He is now engaged in its cultivation and in cattle raising. August 18, 1817, was the date of his birth, and he was first married February 17, 1842, to Anna, daughter of Henry and Elizabeth (Lightner) Harper, now deceased. She was born in Pocahontas county, April 29, 1821, and the children of her marriage were born: Sarah F., June 2, 1844, lives at Little Lewis, this county; Mary E., March 31, 1846, lives on Elk river; Henry H., July 2, 1848, lives at Dunmore, this county; Martha E., October 23, 1851, lives on Elk river; Zane W., February 19, 1858, lives in Missouri; Anna J., September 17, 1862, lives at home; Margaret J. Davis, who was born July 22, 1833, became the wife of Andrew W. Moore, May 19, 1864, and their children are Samuel P. F., born August 1, 1865; Eliza S., November 15, 1868, John A., February 24, 1872; Isaac F., July 25, 1876. Mr. Moore may be addressed at home, Pocahontas county, West Virginia.

DANIEL A. STOFER—a Virginian by birth, has been a resident of Pocahontas county since he was thirty years of age, and for the past eight years has been prosecuting attorney, and still fills the office. He was born in Middleboroek, Augusta county, Virginia, May 5, 1821, a son of Henry Turner Stofer, who died in 1852, and Mary (Piper) Stofer, who died in 1824. He served in the Mexican war, under Taylor, volunteering in 1846, and at the inauguration of the civil war entered the Confederate service. He had two brothers in the same army, one of whom gave his life for the Lost Cause. Daniel A. held the commission of captain, and was in active service until July 19, 1863, when he received five wounds in a skirmish, all in less than one minute. He was wounded once in the face, twice in the breast, and twice in the left leg, breaking the thigh bone off in two places. One ball still remains in the leg. Of the two that entered the breast, one was cut out near the spine, and the other came out under the right arm. The wounds heeled on the surface, and an inward abscess formed, which confined him to his couch for twelve months, subjected him to five operations, and gave him great trouble. Thus his further service was lost to the Confederacy. He is now entirely recovered in health, and in his political and social relations is one of the most popular men in Huntersville, which is his residence and post office address.

COL. RUDOLPH S. TURK—attorney-at-law, practices in Pocahontas, Randolph, and Greenbrier counties, and in the Supreme Court of Appeals. He took up his residence in Pocahontas county in 1875, and in 1877 was elected prosecuting attorney, serving for four years. His birth was in Augusta county, Virginia, in 1848. Rudolph and Annie E. (Robertson) Turk his parents. His mother died in 1855. At Lewisburg, countyseat of Greenbrier county, West Virginia, in December, 1879, Rudolph S. Turk married Willie C. Cary. She was born in Greenbrier county in 1856, a daughter of William Cary, who died in 1858, and Ophelia (Mathews) Cary, who died in 1862. The post office address of Col. Turk is Huntersville, Pocahontas county, West Virginia.

S. PRUYN PATTERSON, M. D.—is a Virginian, born in Staunton, countyseat of Augusta, a son of James F. and Maria H. Patterson, who are no longer living, in Highland county, Virginia, in 1866. Dr. Prayn Patterson was united in marriage with Lizzie R. Campbell, born in Highland county in 1842. Benjamin R. and Margaret (Slaven) Campbell, the latter now deceased, were her parents. The children of Dr. and Mrs. Patterson are one son and two daughters: Harry Prayn, born May 23, 1867; Marge Campbell, February 25, 1869; Annie M., July 25, 1874—all still at home. Dr. Patterson has his residence in Hartsessville, and has practice in that and adjoining districts.

CHARLES WOODS BEARD—was born on Locust creek, Pocahontas county, September 6, 1827, a son of Josiah and Rachel C. (Prayn) Beard, and he married, at Mill Point, this county, August 5, 1858, Elizabeth Jeannette Perkins, born on Anthony's creek, Greenbrier county, July 14, 1834. Samuel and Mary M. (Coulter) Perkins were her parents. Her father is now deceased, as are the parents of Mr. Beard. His mother died in 1873, and his father in 1878. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Beard, all at home, were born: Fannie Cameron, October 15, 1859; Mary Margaret, December 7, 1861; Lucy Emily, May 31, 1864; Rachel Rebecca, March 6, 1867; Nanie Woods, March 5, 1869. Charles W. Beard served in the Confederate army in the war between the States. He volunteered in 1861, joining the 19th Virginia Cavalry, and was wounded in the shoulder at Bunker Hill, near Winchester. He continued in the service until the Confederate army disbanded. Josiah Beard, his father, was elected first clerk of Pocahontas county in 1821, and discharged the duties of that office with integrity and judgment. He was also one of the first elders in the church at Falling Springs, was never known to take an intoxicant, and all who knew him said, "He is a true Christian gentleman." Charles W. Beard owns a fine farm of 260 acres, one mile south of Hillsboro, that known as the "Prayn Homestead." It has no superior in the county in natural facilities and fertility. His post office address is Academy, Pocahontas county, West Virginia.

CYRUS P. BRYAN, M. D.—born in Allegheny county, Virginia, June 28, 1829, was a son of Dr. Hugh P. and Nancy M. (Sawyer) Bryan, both now deceased, in Campbell county, Virginia, July 15, 1858. He wedded Mary W. Scott, and Robert E. Bryn, only child, was born November 21, 1860. He is now a physician and a resident of Goshen, Rockbridge county, Virginia. He is a graduate of the Jefferson Medical College, class of 1862. The wife of Dr. Bryan was born in Campbell county, a daughter of Thomas F. and Margaret P. (Barker) Scott. Cyrus P. Bryan graduated from the Jefferson Medical College, class of 1855, and has been a successful practitioner ever since. During the war he served as a soldier of the 8th county (Virginia) Cavalry, Confederate service, and he acted as surgeon of the military post at Warm Springs in the fall and winter of 1862. He served in the Virginia legislature from July 1, 1863, to April 5, 1865, and in 1875 established himself in Hillsboro, where he is one of the leading physicians, and is president of the local board of health. His post office address is Academy, Pocahontas county, West Virginia.

SHERMAN HARPER CLARK—farmer and stock-raiser of No. 4 (Lowellton) district, owns some very valuable land, with coal deposits, on the headwaters of Spring creek, and in different tracts owns 3,318 acres, all very valuable property. On these lands he is grazing stock, in raising and handling which he is very successful. His father, Sheldon Clark, came to Pocahontas county in 1821, and settled on land where the subject of this sketch is now living. In the year 1827, Sheldon Clark married Mary Lightner, born in this county, and their son, Sherman Harper, was born August 23, 1829. His parents are now both deceased. Joel and Rebecca (Livers) Hill are the parents of Mary Frances, wife of Mr. Clark. She was born in Pocahontas county, near Hillsboro, May 31, 1845, and became the wife of Sherman H. Clark on the 26th of December, 1853. Fannie Caroline, their daughter, was born June 10, 1865. Sherman H. Clark was county surveyor from 1891 to 1898, and is now able filling the office of commissioner of the county court. His post office address is Academy, Pocahontas county, West Virginia.

RICHARD WASHINGTON HILL—son of Joel and Rebecca (Livesay) Hill, natives of Pocahontas county, is a grandson of one of the earliest settlers in this county. His grandfather came from North Carolina, and settled on the creek named in his honor, "Hills creek," during the troubled days when the white men and the Indians were disputing for the soil, and he himself had several narrow escapes from the tomahawk. Richard W. Hill was born on Little Levels, this county, June 3, 1847, and he is now a prosperous farmer and stock-raiser, residing one mile northwest of Hillsboro, having 460 acres of productive land. G. A. Hill, his brother, was in the Confederate army under Gen. Price, and was killed in Carroll county, Missouri, in 1863, by bushwhackers. In Richlands, Greenbrier county, December 14, 1872, Richard W. Hill and Sarah Margaret Watts were united in marriage, and their children were five: Frank Raymond, born October 20, 1873; Joel F. C., January 28, 1876; Glens R. L., December 28, 1878; Harry, January 3, 1882, died in infancy; Anthony B. F., July 30, 1883. The parents of Mrs. Hill were James Franklin Watts, born on Big Levels, Greenbrier county, (now) West Virginia in 1824, and died in same county, December 17, 1883, and Rachel (Bunger) Watts, born in Greenbrier county in January, 1830, and died in the same county in March, 1862. Academy, Pocahontas county, West Virginia, is Richard W. Hill's post office address.

JAMES A. LaRUE, M. D.—is a son of Cyrus Scott LaRue, who was born in Rockbridge county, West Virginia, in 1816, and Julia S. (Alexander) LaRue, born in Augusta county, Virginia, in 1818. His parents are residents in Greenbrier county, West Virginia, and he was born in that county, August 27, 1850. He had one brother, J. H. LaRue, who was captain in Company F, 40th Virginia Infantry, Confederate service, now a lawyer of Pulaski county, Virginia. The LaRues are descended from French Huguenots, who came to America in the 17th century, and whose descendants are scattered over several States, many of them now reckoned Virginians. The Alexanders came from Ireland to America, although, as their name shows, they were of Scottish race. They settled in Pennsylvania in 1740, and part of the family afterward moved to Virginia. Several of the name and blood are well known in the history of the Presbyterian Church, among them Rev. Archibald Alexander of Princeton Seminary, New Jersey. Rev. H. C. Alexander, now professor in the Union Theological Seminary of Virginia. James A. LaRue and Lillian E. Livesay were married near Frankford, Greenbrier county, West Virginia, June 20, 1883. Mrs. LaRue is a daughter of John and Margaret (Bright) Livesay, residents of Greenbrier county. The subject of this sketch was graduated from the College of Physicians and Surgeons at Baltimore, Maryland, in 1876, and in 1878 established himself in the practice of his profession at Academy, Pocahontas county, West Virginia.

HON. WILLIAM LAMB McNEEL—born near Hillsboro, Pocahontas county, July 13, 1823, is a son of Abraham and Magdeline (Kelly) McNeel, now deceased, and a grandson of John McNeel, who came to this county from Capon, (now) West Virginia, about 1770, and reared his primitive log cabin on land now owned among his descendants. He also built the first hewed log house in the county, and it is now owned by J. M. McNeel. In Greenbrier county, (then) Virginia, October 25, 1853, William L. McNeel married Margaret Jane Beard, daughter of Joseph and Martha Beard. She was born October 25, 1833, and died September 12, 1871; Martha Magdeline, born April 7, 1836, married George Callison, and they live in Little Levels, this county; Nannie Eliza, born October 13, 1837, lives at home; William Lloyd, March 9, 1859, lives in Whisman county, Wyoming Territory; John Abraham, November 11, 1860; Joseph Samuel, November 26, 1862; Mary Irene, January 9, 1865—these three at home; Robert Lee, December 11, 1866, died May 8, 1867; Margaret Pauline, March 31, 1868; Henry Washington, December 18, 1870—these two at home; Maggie Wallace, September 26, 1873, lives with her grandparents, At Staunton, Augusta county, Virginia, November 4, 1880. William L. McNeel married Mary E., daughter of Samuel M. and Mary C. Woodward. During the last three years of the war between the States William L. McNeel served in the Confederate army as captain of Company F, 19th Virginia Cavalry. From 1872-6 he was sheriff of Pocahontas county, was elected to the legislature, and is now a member of the West Virginia Senate, elected for the term of four years in 1880. He owns large tracts of fine land in Pocahontas county, and is one of the most successful stock-raisers in the county. His post office address is Academy, Pocahontas county, West Virginia.

FRANKLIN ANDREW RENICK—is a son of William and Rebecca (Renick) Renick, of Greenbrier county, and was born on his father's homestead in that county, near Falling Springs, October 6, 1828. Joseph and Mary (Hanna) Handley, of Falling Springs, Greenbrier county, were the parents of his wife, and she was born on her father's farm February 25, 1839. Their marriage was consummated on the 20th of May, 1857, and the record of their children is: Robert Strother, born Christmas Day, 1858; Thomas Jackson, July 6, 1862; Mary Alice, November 30, 1864; Joseph William, May 25, 1867; Lucy Ellen, October 4, 1869; Jennie Margaret, July 10, 1872; and Eddie, Fannie and baby boy three days old. Robert is making his home at Beaver Canon, Idaho, and the other living children are at Little Levels, this county. On the first of July, 1862, Franklin A. Renick was obliged to enter the Confederate service on credit a substitute and took the first alternative. About the first of April, 1864, the substitute law having been repealed, he was compelled to enter the service, and so he located himself in one substitute in one service. Company D, 14th Virginia Cavalry, and he served till the close of the war. He is now taking prisoner September 9, 1864, and continued in Camp Chase, Ohio, until March 17, 1865, when he took the oath of allegiance and was released, nearly dead with starvation and disease incident upon his confinement without the proper comforts of life. He saw a great deal of the inside corruption which was then disgracing the Federal government, of medicines and food for prisoners that was never allowed to reach its destination, of prisoners escaping or hiring their exchange hurried through bribing Federal officers, and his opinion, with that of all the helpless among the prisoners, was that the government thought that the cheapest way of disposing of them was by killing them off. When he took the oath of allegiance, a Federal officer congratulated him upon his return to the rights and privileges of the United States citizen, but it was some years before the so-called "loyal" citizens of his native State permitted him to exercise the right of franchise. He was in constant marching and skirmishing during his participation in the war, and one heavy stampede, that at Moorefield, when with the peer fellows who formed the rank and file of the line, he fought and took his chance on death, while the greed of the brigade and his staff were roystering two miles away. He is now a farmer and stock-raiser of Lovington district. Mr. Renick owns a fine farm of 1,000 acres, lying at the foot of Droop Mountain. His farm was a part of the battleground on which the famous Droop Mountain fight occurred, and his house was used for a hospital by the Federal soldiers. His post office address is Academy, Pocahontas county, West Virginia.

RUFUS SYLVANUS TOWNSEND—was born and wedded in Maryland, his birth occurring in Talbot county, March 5, 1837, and his marriage solemnized in Cecil county, May 8, 1862. Anna L. Bayan, born in Cecil county, Maryland, May 20, 1835, became his wife, and their children are four living at home, four who died in infancy. Lillian, born April 4, 1865; William Guy, September 27, 1864; Laura, September 16, 1867; Anna Virginia, September 25, 1871; their four at home, and Paul, Sylvanus, Bryan, Martin, and Edith, Mary deceased. William Townsend, died in 1864, and Ann Maria (Benson) Townsend, died in 1866, were the parents of the subject of this sketch, and his wife's parents, Joel and Frances H. (Andrews) Bryan, died, the former in 1868 and the latter in 1875. Sybates Townsend has been a minister of the Gospel since 1859, joining first the Philadelphia Methodist Episcopal Conference. In 1867 he joined the Methodist Episcopal Church (South) Baltimore Conference, and he has traveled circuits in Maryland, Virginia and West Virginia, and in 1883 he was appointed to Levelton circuit, Pocahontas county, and is living at Hillsboro. His address is Academy, Pocahontas county, West Virginia.

COOPER, Dale. See Cooper, Wilma Lee and Stoney.

COOPER, Stoney, a fiddler, was born in Harmon in 1918. He began in radio on the WWVA Jamboree in Wheeling and later appeared on radio in the Midwest and South as well as in Fairmont. He went to the Grand Ole Opry in 1957. After performing for many years with his wife, Wilma Lee Leary Cooper (see) Harvard University voted them the most authentic mountain singing group in America in 1950. Their records were placed in the Library of Music at Harvard.

Among the songs he recorded were: "West Virginia Polka," "Thirty Pieces of Silver," "The Golden Rocket," "The Legend of the Dogwood Tree," "Willie Roy, the Crippled Boy," "Just for a While," "How it Hurts to Be Alone," "Please Help Me If I Am Wrong," "Each Season Changes You," "I Want to Be Loved," "Cheated Too," "This Crazy Crazy World," "There's A Big Wheel," "Walking My Lord Up Calvary's Hill," "Come Walk with Me," "The Tramp on the Street," "The Canadian Reel," "Big Midnight Special," "Rachel's

COOPER, Wilma Lee Leary, a native of Valley Head, was the wife of Stoney Cooper (see). The pair was voted the most authentic mountain singing group in America in 1950 by Harvard University. For records see Stoney Cooper. Mrs. Cooper wrote the following songs: "Cheated Too," "Heartbreak Street." "He Taught Them How," "I Tell My Heart," "Loving You," "My Heart Keeps Crying," "Tomorrow I'll Be Gone," and was co-writer of "Big Midnight Special."

LOUISE McNell's new voice recognized throughout the country.

Miss McNell, in private life Mrs. Roger Waterman Pease, was born and reared on a mountain farm near Marlinton in Pocahontas County. The McNell family has lived on that farm since pre-Revolutionary days. As a young girl she attended the two-room school house where her father taught.

She is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. G.H. McNell. Her father, who taught school for many years, got his A.B. degree at the age of 40, went on for his A.M., and ultimately received his Ph.D. degree at the age of 63.

Miss McNell received her Bachelor's degree in English from Concord College and her Master's degree in English from Miami University of Ohio. She later received a doctorate in history from West Virginia University because at that time West Virginia University did not offer a doctorate in English. Her doctoral dissertation, Kanawha and the Old South, has been published by the West Virginia University Press.

Her most famous work is Cerulean Mountain, which was her first collection of poems published in 1938 with a foreword written by Stephen Vincent Benet. Cerulean Mountain is a series of historical poems tracing the lives of various West Virginia families, as heavily slanted toward pioneer life, as are many of her other poems. This volume has been reprinted in a limited edition and is one of 28 books relating to West Virginia history being supplied to high school libraries throughout the state in an effort to build up a greater knowledge of West Virginia.

Time Is Our House, her second volume of poetry, was published in 1942. It contains philosophical poems and a section of lyrics on World War II. This volume was

Her most recent book of poems, Paradox Hill: From Appalachians to Lower Shore, was published by the West Virginia University Library with private funds made available through the West Virginia University Foundation, Inc. In this book she looks at the heritage of the Mountain State residents as she meets their consciousness from present days to atomic frontiers and looks to the future with uncertainty.

Miss McNeill writes in traditional verse form. She believes, however, that the beauty of poetry lies in content and feeling rather than in form. She believes poetry should be useful to relieve the mind and useful to society. She is a person with strong convictions about herself, her heritage, her homeland and its future. Miss McNeill's ability to translate these convictions into compelling poetry that is what makes her poetry beautiful.

Miss McNeill has also written several short stories about rural life, many of which were published by the Form Journal.

Her name is well known to the editors and publishers of such respected national literary magazines as Saturday Review and American Monthly, which have published her poems. During the '30's, she was a frequent contributor to the Saturday Evening Post, Ladies Home Journal, Good Housekeeping, Nation, and other magazines. Some of her first poems appeared in The Daily Athenaeum, student newspaper, when she was a student at West Virginia University in the 1920's.

Now McNeill is now retired and living in Morgantown. She taught at Concord College, Potomac State College, West Virginia University, in Pocahontas County elementary schools and at Aiken, South Carolina, Preparatory School, and Fairmont State College.

Miss McNeill met her husband at the Broad Leaf Writers' Conference near Middlebury, Vermont. She had won a scholarship to the conference on the basis of a poem that appeared in the American Monthly. Her husband, formerly of Ashfield, Mass., is a former instructor at West Virginia University. They have a son, Douglas, who is a graduate of the University of Connecticut.

In recent years, Miss McNeill has been an instructor at the Summer Writers' Conference at Marietta, Ohio. She has always taken a keen interest in helping others to learn to write well. — Virginia Lambert

MILLER, Mrs. Allen McVeigh. To be continued in our next' was the promise which kept Mrs. Allen McVeigh Miller at the writing of novel stories for nearly thirty years. An exacting person, but keeping it brought firm and a fortune to this indefatigable woman. A daughter of our Mother State, she came as a bride to West Virginia, where she lived nearly forty of the best years of her life.

"I wrote romances," Mrs. Miller says, "that followed a straight course from my brain to the tip of my fountain pen." Her most recent book of poems, Paradox Hill. From Appalachia to Lunar Shore, was published by the West Virginia University Library with private funds made available through the West Virginia University Foundation, Inc. In this book she looks at the heritage of the Mountain State residents as she traces their consciousness from pioneer days to atomic frontiers and looks to the future with uncertainty.

Miss McNeill writes in traditional verse form. She believes, however, that the beauty of poetry lies in content and feeling rather than in form. She believes poetry should be useful—useful to the spirit, useful to relieve the mind and useful to society. She is a person with strong convictions about herself, her heritage, her husband and its future. Miss McNeill's ability to translate these convictions into compelling poetic rhythms is what makes her poetry so beautiful.

Miss McNeill has also written several short stories about rural life, many of which were published by the Farm Journal.

Her name is well known to the editors and publishers of such respected national literary magazines as Saturday Review and Atlantic Monthly, which have published her poems. During the 1930's, she was a frequent contributor to the Saturday Evening Post, Ladies Home Journal, Good Housekeeping, Harper's, and other magazines. Some of her first poems appeared in the Daily Athenaeum, student newspaper, when she was a student at West Virginia University in the 1920's.

Miss McNeill is now retired and living in Morgantown. She taught at Fairmont College

Potomac State College, West Virginia University, in Pocahontas County elementary schools and at Athens, South Carolina, Preparatory School, and Fairmont State College.

Miss McNeill met her husband at the Broadleaf Writers' Conference near Middlebury, Vermont. She had won a scholarship to the conference on the basis of a poem that appeared in the Atlantic Monthly. Her husband, formerly of Ashfield, Mass., is a former instructor at West Virginia University. They have a son, Douglas, who is a graduate of the University of Connecticut.

In recent years, Miss McNeill has been an instructor at the Summer Writers Conference at Marietta, Ohio. She has always taken a keen interest in helping others to learn to write well — Vaughn Lechert.

MILLER, Mrs. Alex McVeigh. To be continued in our next! was the promise which kept Mrs. Alex McVeigh Miller at the writing of serial stories for nearly thirty years. An exacting promise, but keeping it brought fame and a fortune to this indefatigable woman. Miss McNeill, in private life Mrs. Roger Waterman Peace, was born and reared on a mountain farm near Marlinton in Pocahontas County. The McNeill family has lived on that farm since pre-Revolutionary days. As a young girl she attended the two-room school house where her father taught.

She is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. G. H. McNeill. Her father, who taught school for many years, got his A.B. degree at the age of 40, went on for his A.M., and ultimately received his Ph.D. degree at the age of 65.

Miss McNeill received her Bachelor's degree in English from Concord College and her Master's degree in English from Miami University of Ohio. She later received a doctorate in history from West Virginia University because at that time West Virginia University did not offer a doctorate in English. Her doctoral dissertation, Kanawha and the Old South has been published by the West Virginia University Press.

Her most famous work is Gauley Mountain, which was her first collection of poems, published in 1939 with a foreword written by Stephen Vincent Benet. Gauley Mountain, a series of historical poems tracing the lives of various West Virginia families, is heavily slanted toward pioneer life, as are many of her other poems. This volume has been reprinted in a limited edition and is one of 25 books relating to West Virginia history being supplied to high school libraries throughout the state in an effort to build up a greater knowledge of West Virginia.

Time Is Our Hour, her second volume of poetry, was published in 1942. It contains philosophical poems and a section of lyrics on World War II. This volume was "Then decorating my hat with a military feather, it was placed upon Nancy's head, and she was greatly elated when the operator showed her her portrait."

HART, Nancy. Few West Virginians were aware that they had a famous spy as a native until Letcher's Weekly for May 26, 1910 carried the story of a part she played in the Civil War. The story was by Morton H. Kerner, a Civil War telegrapher, who had reasons to remember Nancy because it was because of her that he spent time in a Confederate prison. This is the story that alerted West Virginians to the fact that there had been a spy in their midst, but it was too late for recognition because by then Nancy had been in her grave on Mannings Knob eight years.

After the battle of Ball's Bluff, in October 1861 I was transferred to Gauley Bridge. After a short stay there I was ordered to proceed to Summersville, W. Va. On leaving Gauley Bridge, one of my comrades, Isaac D. Maize (now living in Philadelphia), remarked to me, "You will come back by way of the South." He was a true prophet, as will now be explained.

After a tedious and perilous ride over rugged and uncertain paths, we emerged from the density of the mountain forest into the more cheerful and inspiring sunlight which greeted us as we turned our horses' heads toward Summersville, on the broad Clarksburg turnpike. I reported to Lieutenant-Colonel William C. Starr, who commanded the detachment of about sixty effective men of the Ninth West Virginia Regiment stationed at this post, the main body of which I had left at Gauley Bridge. Colonel Starr's headquarters was in a pretty, two-story and attic frame dwelling, which had been hastily abandoned by its occupants upon the approach of the "Yankee troops." All the comforts of a happy country home were in evidence here. The parlor furniture was plain, but comfortable; the walls were adorned with engravings and colored prints or chromos indicative of the artistic taste of the family; the dining-room, kitchen and bedrooms were well equipped. The large front room on the second floor, which formerly had contained a double bed, was now furnished with four single cots, which were used by Colonel Starr, Captain Davis, Lieutenant Stivers and myself. The double bed had been relegated to one of the two attic rooms, for whatever emergency might arise. It was unexpected when it did arise.

The little garden back of the house had been stripped of all vegetation, so it became necessary for us to resort to a little foraging for whatever fresh vegetables our appetites might crave. One warm July day, in 1862, a foraging party, made up of Colonel Starr, Captain Davis, two orderlies and myself, started out in search of such table luxuries as our garden had ceased to supply. We had been out about three hours when smoke was discovered ascending from the valley below, indicating a habitation, in the direction of the smoke we guided our horses, and soon came to a log cabin, in front of which were two mountain insiders busily engaged in crushing corn between two big boulders which had been fastened for that purpose. When they saw us approaching, they ran into the cabin and barred the heavy wooden door after them. Seeing the cabin, we saw the face of an old woman peering through the little linged window on one side of the door, and heard her exclaim to the girls, "The Yankees are upon us!" Lieutenant-Colonel Starr dismounted from his horse and gently knocked upon the door, but receiving no response, he knocked more vigorously. After several vain attempts he went to the window, and assuming the old lady that our mission was a friendly one, she was persuaded to exchange some of her garden truck for the liberal supply of salt we offered. This important commodity was scarce and very expensive in this region, as well as all over the South.

When our sacks were filled, we were about to remount our horses and return to Summersville, when Lieutenant-Colonel Starr drew from his pocket a description of a young girl, named Nancy Hart, a rebel guide, for whose capture the government had offered a liberal reward. He handed the paper to Captain Davis, and after a brief consultation the two returned to the cabin and, dismounting, approached the young girls, who had resumed their corn crushing. Lieutenant-Colonel Starr laid his hand gently upon the shoulders of one of the girls and said, "Well, Nancy, at last we've got you!" "My God!" she exclaimed. "I am not Nancy Hart! What are you going to do with me?" With the unconscious confession from the girl's own lips, there was no further hesitation. She and her companion were taken to Summersville and incarcerated in a dilapidated old building which had formerly served as the jail. Escape would have been easy for these symbols of the mountains but for the vigilance of the guards, who constantly patrolled the building on every side.

The personal comfort of prisoners of war was not a subject for serious consideration in those turbulent times, a place in which to secure them being more important. But here were two young women, untutored and uncultured, if it is true, but still they were women, and their condition in this miserable old building excited my sympathy. I thought of the vacant attic in our headquarters, and appealed to Colonel Starr to transfer his prisoners to this more comfortable abode. After much persuasion the colonel consented, and the transfer was duly made. To while away the dreary hours of our imprisonment, I supplied them with sewing material and illustrated papers, which they could not read, but they eagerly studied the pictures. They were also furnished with such dainties as the sutler's wagon afforded, and I did what I could to allay their thirst.

One day an itinerant ambrotypist came along, and by permission of the colonel I escorted Nancy out to the wagon under guard to have her picture taken. She had never seen a camera before, and became very much excited when asked to sit before the instrument, which the operator had focused upon a mossy camp stool. She was assured of its harmlessness only when my picture was taken. Then, decorating my hat with a military feather, it was placed upon Nancy's head, and she was greatly amused when the operator showed her the portrait. The picture was framed in a little case bearing the American eagle and United States flag in alternations on the back. One of these copies is still in my possession, and is reproduced (herewith).

During the day the door of the room occupied by the girls was kept open, so that the guard patrolling in front might keep an eye on his charges. No restriction was placed upon conversation with the girls, but the guards were not allowed to enter the room. Nevertheless, Nancy managed to win the confidence of one of them so far as to secure his musket, probably in order to convince him that she could shoulder it as well as she had ever shouldered her rifle, with which, she said, her skill had enabled her to furnish the home with all sorts of game, large and small, that abounded in the mountains. No sooner had she grasped the musket in her hands, however, than she stepped back in the room, and lifting it to her shoulder, fired. Her guard fell dead at his post, and Nancy, jumping over his body, rushed downstairs and out to the barn.

where she mounted Colonel Starr's horse, and, without saddle or bridle, fled away before the sleeping officials could possibly realize what had happened. This was about four o'clock in the morning. The next thing we heard was the alarm from the outposts, but Nancy had escaped, leaving her unfortunate companion behind, who related to us the circumstances of the shooting of the guard just as she had witnessed it with her own astonished eyes.

Men were immediately sent in pursuit, the little cove at the foot of the mountain was closely watched, the mountains were scoured in every direction, but no sign of Nancy, until one morning, a week later, she appeared at the head of a battalion of Jackson's cavalry, five hundred strong, under command of Major Bailey, who surrounded our headquarters and without much resistance captured the entire force, including one Dr. Rucker, for whom the Confederates had long been looking and whom they were anxious to capture on account of his Union proclivities. Even the men at the outposts were dragged into the net and held up in front of headquarters for the march to Dixie. Nancy had not forgotten the little favors which had shortened the hours of her captivity, so when she saw me in the line of prisoners she hastened to Major Bailey and told him that I was not a Yankee, but that I, too, was a prisoner, and he ought to let me go. With this assurance from the girl, he allowed me to enter the house to get my effects.

My first thought upon entering the office was to secure the main line sounder, an important telegraph instrument, which was still in place. This I did, and placing it under an army blanket which I threw over my arm, made my way down the turnpike in the direction of Gauley Bridge. I had proceeded about a mile when I came to the place where the wire had been cut by the enemy to prevent communication with the main body of the regiment. Placing my instrument in circuit and grounding the Summersville side, I found the wire "O. K." to Gauley Bridge.

While in the act of reporting the capture, I was surprised by half a dozen mounted men, who approached with carbines leveled at me and ordered me to dismount. I promptly obeyed the order, and likewise accepted without hesitation their pressing invitation to join them in a little excursion back to Summersville. When the case was reported to Major Bailey, he flew into a rage and with an oath threatened to "shoot the little Yankee traitor." But Nancy again came to my rescue. What she told the major I never knew, but he put me under guard, and, as my comrade at Gauley Bridge had predicted, my face was turned toward the South.

We marched over those rough mountain paths all day and until long after sundown before we reached a spot where it was safe to rest for the night. This was in an open piece of ground on the mountainside far away from the turnpike, which our escort avoided for fear of being overtaken by our troops. Several of our soldiers were without substantial footwear, and they suffered with sore feet until we were finally unable to march. Then we were mounted on horses and the former riders walked until we reached the pike again. The horse I rode was without saddle and there were no stirrups. I suffered more torment than when walking, for the blood rushed to my hanging feet and they felt as if they were being held down by heavy weights. Fortunately, however, a country wagon was improvised into service, and the weary were tumbled into it and we rode the remainder of the way to White Sulphur Springs.

General Loring was in command here, and after securing Dr. Backer in irons and loading the prisoners they marched us to Christiansburg, where we were hustled into a cattle train and sent to Lynchburg fair grounds. Here I met Frank Lamb, Frank Drummond, Charlie Moore and Henry Buell, members of the United States Military Telegraph Corps, who had been captured previously. From Lynchburg we were sent, on August 11th, to Belle Isle and thence to Libby Prison, where we remained until paroled on September 14th, 1862. Frank Drummond's prison diary of August 31st, 1862, records that the street guards had orders to shoot any prisoner whose head appeared flush with the window. One of the operators forgot himself one day and leaned out to view the James River. He drew back as he saw the guard raise his gun. When the shot was fired, we heard a commotion above us and later learned that the ball had passed through our ceiling and killed a sergeant who was sitting on a table in the room above, four or five feet from the window.

One day an official of the prison came into our room and called out Frank Lamb, Frank Drummond, Henry Buell, Marion Kerner. He escorted us to the office, where we were confronted by General Winder. The official who had taken us into the office avoided my inquiry as to why we were called, but intimated something about hostages for a Confederate telegraphist who had been convicted of being a spy, and that we might be subjected to whatever punishment the "Yankee government" imposed upon him, and meantime would be held as hostages pending negotiations. At last a broad official form was produced, containing our descriptions and an obligation for our signature under oath. "This," said Winder, "is a parole; sign it and prepare to return to your homes." After each had signed his name, it suddenly flashed upon us that Charlie Moore was not there. We could not leave our comrade behind. A search of the record disclosed the fact that his name had been inadvertently omitted. Aftersome delay the official departed to bring Moore.

Returning to our ward we packed up our belongings and took passage on a wagon to the James River, where the United States steamer New York was waiting to take aboard the exchanged and paroled prisoners. We made no landings until we reached Annapolis, where we were put ashore and left to shift for ourselves. Our first thought was of the telegraph office and a message to the War Department announcing our arrival and destitute condition. Arrangements for our transportation reached us with orders to report at the War Department. We were a sorry looking lot of tramps. Not one of the party cared to present himself until divested of his veteran costume which had been worn during imprisonment. There was no way to overcome our modesty but to raise money by hook or crook.

After a long discussion as to ways and means, one of the prodigal volunteers to go to General Anson Stager, general superintendent of military telegraphs. Putting on his happiest expression, he boldly entered General Stager's office and cautioned him to stand about while he told the story which brought forth enough cash for our immediate necessities. "Come in to-morrow when you get cleaned up," said the general. The "volunteer's return" brought joy to the hearts of the other four despondent knights of the key.

We purchased new outfits at the store of Saks & Co. on Seventh Street. We made quite a respectable appearance the following day when we entered the office of General Stager, and the greeting we received was most fraternal and hearty. The stories of our capture and imprisonment were told by each one in detail, and we were provided with railroad passes to our respective homes, where anxious hearts were awaiting our return.

Nancy Hart, the prime cause of my prison experience, was never seen again by me, and she has probably passed away long ago.

Note: Miss Gladys Vaughan of Keaslers Cross Lane supplied the Leslie's clipping for this work. To set history right, she added some facts about Nancy Hart's life. After the war she married Joshua Douglass and bore him two sons, George and Kennos. Nancy's last public appearance was shortly before her death, and at the court house in Lewisburg to testify in behalf of Kennos who was charged with the killing of Tom Reed at a dance in Trout Valley. Dr. William F. Rucker, a brilliant lawyer and physician who lived near Keaslers Cross Lane in the bend of the Gauley River, known for years as the Rucker Bend, defended Kennos.

Nancy Hart is buried on Mannings Knob in Greenbrier County. Her grave is in the cemetery where the Mannings family buried their slaves. At the foot of the hill stood the Manning plantation home, known today of the Manning family. Buried there, too, is Ivan Hunter of Richwood. He owned the fire tower which was on the knob and became so infatuated with the memory of the spy and so engrossed in her life that he asked to be buried by her side.

HATFIELD WOMEN Over the years, much has been written about the male members of the Hatfield clan who took part in that early orgy of blood-letting — the Hatfield-McCoy feud. But nothing has been said concerning the indomitable wives of that stalwart breed of men.

My purpose is to pay a rightly deserved tribute to one of those pioneer women — the late Nancy Elizabeth, wife of William Anderson Hatfield, commonly known as "Cap," second son of Devil Anse, and the most deadly killer of the feud.

More than 30 years have passed since I last talked with her; but I still regard Nancy Elizabeth Hatfield as the most remarkable and unforgettable woman of the mountains.

In the spring of 1924, I was a candidate in the primary election for the Republican nomination for attorney general, and I wanted the Hatfield influence. Devil Anse had died in 1921, and his mantle of leadership of the clan had fallen to his oldest living son, Cap — a power in Logan County politics.

I had met Cap, casually, in 1912, but I had not seen him since that meeting. But his sister, Mrs. Betty Caldwell, and her husband, lived in my county of Mercer, and were among my political supporters. To pave the way for my later meeting with Cap, I had Mrs. Caldwell write and ask him to support me.

Later, when campaigning in the City of Logan, I engaged a taxi to take me the few miles up Island Creek to Cap's home. The car stopped suddenly and the driver pointed to a comfortable-looking farm house on the other side of the creek and said:

NANCY ELIZABETH (MRS. CAP)
HATFIELD (1933)

I told him to return for me in two hours.

Cap saw me get out of the car, and, as I crossed the creek on an old-fashioned footlog, I saw him fold his arms across his chest and slip his right hand under his coat. Later, I noticed a large pistol holstered under his left arm. Even in that late day, Cap took no chances with strangers. When I got within speaking distance, I told him my name, and that I had come to seek his support in my campaign for attorney general. He gave me a hearty handshake, and said:

"My sister, Mrs. Caldwell, wrote us about you. But, let's go to the house, my wife is the politician in our family."

Cap was reluctant to commit himself "so early." But Nancy Elizabeth thought otherwise. Finally, Cap agreed to support me, and, with that point settled, we parted until my taxi returned. Meanwhile, with Cap's approval, Nancy Elizabeth gave me the accompanying heretofore unpublished photograph of the Devil Anse Clan. In 1963 I rephotographed it and sent a print to Willis Hatfield (number 23 in picture), only survivor of Devil Anse, who made the identifications. Nancy Elizabeth's number 16, and the baby in her lap is her son, Robert Elliott, born April 29, 1897. Therefore, the photograph must have been made late in 1897, or early in 1898.

A few months after Cap's death (August 22, 1936), the West Virginia newspaper publishers and editors held their annual convention in Logan. I was invited to address the group at a morning session. That same day, Sheriff Joe Hatfield and his brother, Tennis, younger brothers of Cap, gave an ox-coast dinner for the visiting newsmen and their press. The picnic was held on a narrow strip of bottom land, on Island Creek, a half-mile below the old home of Devil Anse.

I ate lunch with Nancy Elizabeth and her sister-in-law, Betty Caldwell. After lunch, at the suggestion of Mrs. Caldwell, we three drove up the creek to the old home of her father—Devil Anse. It was a large, two-story, frame structure (since destroyed by fire, then occupied by Tennis Hatfield, youngest son of Devil Anse).

The most interesting feature in the old home was Devil Anse's gun-room. Hanging along its walls were a dozen, or more, high-powered rifles, and a number of large caliber pistols, ranging from the earliest to the latest models. "The older guns," said Nancy Elizabeth, "were used in the feud."

As we returned, we stopped at the family cemetery that clings uncertainly to the steep mountainside, overlooking the picnic grounds. There, among the mountain he loved and ruled, old Devil Anse found peace. A life-size statue of the old man, carved in Italy (from a photograph) of the finest Carrara marble, stands in majestic solitude above his grave. On its four-foot high granite base are carved the names of his wife and their thirteen children.

Our next stop was at the home of Nancy Elizabeth, the same home where I visited with her and Cap during my campaign. For nearly three hours I asked questions and listened to that remarkable woman recount many of her experiences as the wife of America's most celebrated feudist.

Nancy Elizabeth's home also held a number of guns, pistols, and other relics of the feud days. But the most interesting item was Cap's bullet-proof, steel breastplate, designed to cover the entire front half of his body from his neck to his lower abdomen.

"Mrs. Hatfield," I said, "judging from the three bullet marks on it, this breastplate was a great protection to Cap; but what was to prevent an enemy from shooting him in the back?" Her eyes flashed as she replied: "Mr. Lee, Cap Hatfield never turned his back on an enemy or a friend."

"I have read two stories, Mrs. Hatfield, each purporting to give the true cause of the feud:

One book stated that it was the result of a dispute between a McCoy and a Hatfield over the ownership of a hog;

Another book said that it grew out of the seduction of a McCoy girl by Johnson Hatfield, oldest son of Devil Anse. Is either one of these stories true?"

"No. Neither story is true," she replied. "The McCoy's lived on the Kentucky side of Tug River, and the Hatfields lived on the West Virginia side. Hogs don't swim over. I never heard the girl story until I read it in a book, written long after the feud was over. Both stories are pure fiction.

"The truth is," she continued, "in the fall of 1882, in an election-day fight between Elison Hatfield, a younger brother of Devil Anse, and three McCoy brothers, Elison was shot and knifed. He died two days later. In retaliation, Devil Anse and his clan captured and shot the three McCoy brothers. It was these four senseless killings that started the feud."

In answer to my inquiry, Nancy Elizabeth said:

"Yes, there had been 'bad blood' between the two families since the Civil War. In that struggle the Hatfields were 'Rebels', — loyal to their State, Virginia, Devil Anse organized and was the captain of a company of Confederate sympathizers called the 'Logan Wildcats'. They were recruited for local defense, but they left the county long enough to take part in the battle of Scary, fought along the banks of the Kanawha River, a few miles below Charleston.

"The McCoy's, and their mountain neighbors, were pro-Union, and to protect their region against invasion by 'Virginia Rebels', they organized a military company called 'Home Guards'. There were occasional border clashes between the two forces, with casualties on both sides. The war ended only seventeen years before the feud began, and the bitterness still existed in the minds of the older generation, and they passed it on to their children. It was the old sectional and political hatreds that sparked the fight between Elison Hatfield and the McCoy brothers."

Nancy Elizabeth declined to estimate the number killed on either side in the feud.

"It was a horrible nightmare to me," she said. "Sometimes, for months, Cap never spent a night in our house. He and Devil Anse, with others, slept in the nearby woods to guard our homes against surprise attacks. At times, too, we women and our children slept in hidden shelters in the forests.

"But these assaults were not one-sided affairs. The Hatfields crossed the Tug and killed McCoy's. It was a savage war of extermination, regardless of age or sex. Finally, to get our children to a safer locality, we Hatfields left Tug River, crossed the mountains, and settled here on Island Creek, a tributary of the Guyandot River.

"No, there was no formal truce ending hostilities. After a decade, or more, of fighting and killing, both sides grew tired and quit. The McCoy's stayed in Kentucky and the Hatfields kept to West Virginia. The feud was really over a long time before either side realized it.

"Yes, Kentucky offered a large reward for the capture of Devil Anse and Cap. The governor of West Virginia refused to extradite them because, said he, 'their trials in Kentucky would be nothing more than legalized lynchings'. It was then that Kentucky's governor offered the reward for their capture - 'dead or alive'. Three attempts were made by reward seekers to capture them.

"Dan Cunningham, a Charleston detective, with two Cincinnati detectives, made the first attempt. They came through Kentucky, and crossed Tug River in the night; but the Hatfields soon captured them. A justice of the peace sentenced them to 90 days in Logan County jail for 'disturbing the peace'. When released, they were told to follow the Guyandot River to Huntington, a distance of 60 miles, and 'not to come back'.

"Next, a man named Phillips led two rads from Kentucky into Hatfield territory. In the first, he captured 'Cotton-top' Morgan, a relative and supporter of the Hatfields, and took him to Pikeville, Kentucky, where he was hanged. But the second party met with disaster at the 'Battle of the Grapevine'. Phillips, and some of his followers, escaped into Kentucky, but some were hanged where they fell.

"This was the last attempt of the reward seekers. However, Kentucky never withdrew the reward offer, and that is why Devil Anse and Cap were always armed and on the alert."

"Mrs. Hatfield, your husband and his father bore the same given names, - 'William Anderson'. How did they get the nicknames of 'Cap' and 'Devil Anse'?"

"It is very simple," she replied, "Early in life Devil Anse's name was shortened to 'Anse'. During, and after, the Civil War he was called 'Captain Anse'. The son, because he had the same name as his father, was called 'Little Cap'. As the boy grew larger, the word 'Little' was dropped also, because of their fierceness in feud combats, the McCoy's called the father 'Devil Anse' and the son 'Bad Cap'. The newspapers took up the names, and they stuck. Devil Anse liked and cultivated his title; but, eventually, the word 'Bad' was dropped from Cap's nickname.

"Was I afraid? For years, day and night, I lived in fear. Afraid for my own safety, and for the safety of my loved ones. Constant fear is a terrible emotion; it takes a heavy toll, mentally and physically.

"I now think that my most anxious moments, as well as my greatest thrill, came years after the feud was over. In 1922, Tennessee Hatfield and another deputy sheriff went over to Pikeville, Kentucky, to return a prisoner, wanted in Logan County. While there, Tennis visited the aged Randolph McCoy, surviving leader of his clan during the feud. (Tennis was born long after the feud was over). The old man was delighted to see 'Devil Anse's youngest son', and Tennis spent the night with him.

The next morning, Randolph told Tennis that he was going home with him. 'I want to see Cap,' he said, 'and tell him how glad I am that I didn't kill him. I am sorry Devil Anse is gone. I would like to see him, too.' Tennis was worried. He didn't know how Cap would receive his old enemy. So, he left Randolph in Logan while he came up to our place to consult Cap.

"Cap listened to Tennis's story, and said:

"Does he come in peace?"

"Yes," said Tennis, "he comes in peace."

"Does he come unarmed?"

"Yes, he comes unarmed."

"Then, I shall be happy to meet him in the same way. Bring him up for supper, and he shall spend the night with us."

"My anxious moments were not before these two strong-willed men met. I knew how they had hated each other; that each had tried to kill the other, more than once, that each had killed relatives and friends of the other, and I was afraid of what they might do when they stood face to face.

"My thrill came when I saw them clasp hands, and heard each one tell the other how happy he was to see him. They talked far into the night, and both were up early the next morning, eager to continue their talks. Tennis came about one o'clock to drive Randolph back to his Kentucky home. Cap watched them until they passed out of sight up the creek, and then remarked 'You know, I always did like that cantankerous old cuss'.

"Cap and Randolph never saw each other again."

"Mrs. Hatfield, we have talked much about an era that is gone. - Feuds are ended, railroads and paved highways have come, the huge coal industry has developed, churches and schools are everywhere, and people are educated. Now, I would like to know something about you."

This is the brief life-story of the remarkable and unforgettable Nancy Elizabeth Hatfield, as she related it to me.

She was Nancy Elizabeth Smith, called "Nan" by her family and friends; born in Wayne County, West Virginia, September 10, 1866. (She died August 24, 1942). In her early years, she lived "close enough to the Ohio River," she said, "to see the big boats that brought people and goods up from below." She attended a country school three months out of the year, and acquired the rudiments of a common school education, plus a yearning for wider knowledge.

While she was still a young girl her parents moved by push-boat up the Big Sandy and Tug rivers into what is now Mingo County, then Logan County. They settled on the wilderness on Mate Creek, near the site of the present town of Matewan.

"Why they made that move," said Nancy Elizabeth, "I have never understood."

In her new environment, in the summer of 1880, when she was 14 years old, Nancy Elizabeth married Joseph M. Glenn, an enterprising young adventurer from Georgia, who had established a store in the mountains, and floated rafts of black walnut logs, and other timber, down the Tug and Big Sandy rivers to the lumber mills of Catlettsburg, Ky., and Portsmouth, Ohio.

Two years after their marriage Glenn was waylaid and murdered by a former business associate, named Bill Smith - no relation to Nancy Elizabeth. Smith escaped into the wilderness and was never apprehended. The 16-year old widow was left with a three-weeks old infant son, who grew to manhood, and for years, that son, the late Joseph M. Glenn, was a leading lawyer in the city of Logan.

On October 11, 1883, a year after her husband's death, at the age of 17, Nancy Elizabeth married the 19-year old Cap Hatfield, second son of Devil Anse.

"He was the best looking young man in the settlement," she proudly told me.

But at that time Cap had little to recommend him, except his good looks. He was born Feb. 6, 1864, during the Civil War, and grew up in a wild and lawless wilderness, where people were torn and divided by political and sectional hatreds and family feuds - a ragged, mountain land, without roads, schools, or churches.

When he married, Cap could neither read nor write, but he possessed the qualities necessary for survival in that turbulent time and place - he was "quick on the draw, and a dead shot."

"When we were married, Cap was not a very good risk as a husband," said Nancy Elizabeth. "The feud had been going on for a year, and he was already its most deadly killer. Kentucky had set a price on his head. But we were young, he was handsome, and I was deeply in love with him. Besides, he was the best shot on the border, and I was confident that he could take care of himself and he did."

Nancy Elizabeth taught her handsome husband to read and wrote, and imparted to him the meager learning she had acquired in the country school in Wayne County. But, more important, she instilled into him her own hunger for knowledge.

Cap had a brilliant mind, and he set about to improve it. He and Nancy Elizabeth bought and read many books on history and biography, and they also subscribed for and read a number of the leading magazines of their day. In time they built up a small library of good books, which they read and studied along with their children.

At the urging of Nancy Elizabeth, Cap decided to study law, and enrolled at the University Law School at Huntington, Tennessee. But six months later, a renewal of the feud brought him back to the mountains. He never returned to law school, but continued his legal studies at home, and was admitted to the bar in Wyoming and Maga counties. However, he never practiced the profession.

Nancy Elizabeth and Cap raised seven of their nine children, and Nancy's eyes grew moist as she talked of the sacrifices she and Cap had made that their children might obtain the education she had denied to their parents. But her face glowed with a mother's pride as she said:

"All our children are reasonably well educated. Three are college graduates, and the others attended college from one to three years. But, above everything else, they are all good and useful citizens."

As I left the home of the remarkable and unforgettable Nancy Hatfield, I knew that I had been in the presence of a queenly woman - a real "Mountain Queen." - Howard B. Lee, former Attorney General of West Virginia.

BETSY BYARS

BYARS, Betsy, well known author of books for children, was born in Charlotte, North Carolina in 1928.

She grew up in that city and studied for two years at Furman University in Greenville, South Carolina, then returned to Charlotte, where she earned a degree in English from Queens College in 1950.

While her husband was a graduate student at the University of Illinois, she started writing articles for periodicals such as Look, The Saturday Evening Post, and others. She also began writing books for children, among them Clementine, The Dancing Camel, Rama, The Gopher Cat, The Grinch, The Midnight Fox, Franklin River, The Summer of the Swans and Go and Hush the Owl. The Summer of the Swans which won the Newbery Medal in 1971 has a West Virginia setting.

as do several of her other books.

In 1960 Mrs. Byars and her family moved to West Virginia, where her husband became an engineering instructor at West Virginia University.

CARPENTER, Kate. While Sulphur Springs was originally patented by Nicholas Carpenter, husband of Kate Carpenter. He established his family at the Springs in 1750.

The Carpenter household was situated in a dangerous location. Unfriendly Indians that lived near the springs know of their healing waters.

Nicholas and Kate had a warning of an oncoming Indian raid. Nicholas decided to take his family to a fort nearby. This fort was located in Covington about thirty miles away.

Carpenter left first with his older children, and he intended to return later for Kate and their youngest daughter, Frances. But he fell victim of the Indians while defending the fort. Kate grew apprehensive when her husband did not return and fled to a nearby mountain with Frances.

This mountain still bears her name today and is noted for its "Kate's Mountain Clover." Covering the mountain are rare wild flowers and ancient box huckleberry.

Kate left the mountain after some time and made her way to the fort. She later moved to Staunton, which became her home.

Kate's daughter, Frances, inherited the 951 acres surrounding the springs. She later married Capt. Michael Bowyer II in 1766. They had four children and made their home in Staunton.

After the death of his wife, Capt. Bowyer moved to Greenbrier and settled on the Carpenter lands. In 1784 Bowyer secured a patent for an adjacent

She graduated from Storer College at Harpers Ferry at the age of 19 and later attended Oberlin College, Ohio State University and Columbia University. Her teaching career included service in public schools
